This principle explains why the Board of Aldermen, composed chiefly of the small fry among the local politicians, has for fifty years been a discreditable body, and she'd have been abolished in favor of the Council, or legislators representing even larger constituencies.

The position of the New York taxpayer is not promising now. If the body which now protects him from the innumerable schemes for wasting the public funds is abolished in favor of the new body, his position will be perilous.

Athletics at College.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your article in yesterday's issue on "Victorious Harvard" sounds a timely note of warning, and I should like to join in a protest against the athletic infatuation among students and graduates, and against the countenance and encouragement given to athletics, as now practiced, by those in authority, to which is largely owing the extreme degree to which the craze was grown, so that serious embarrassment is caused to students of moderate means who do not like to refuse but who cannot afford to meet the incessant demands made upon them.

I remember the time when I, too, thought the world revolved about college athletics, but I look back to that as my period of swaddling clothes, a period which I thoughtmen generally outgrew. Now I do not care a copper whether Yale beats Harvard or Harvard beats Yale. And yet I am not indifferent to the name and fame of my Alma Mater, but my interest centres in its intellectual life. It makes a great difference to me whether she stands pre-eminent for scholarship; whether she, as a leader of the Nation's intellectual strength, is bravely and loyally holding up the love of truth and of the ideal as a beacon to mark the path of progress for those who are striving for better things. And I sorrow when I see the highest aims obscured and lost sight of in the infatuation of animal strength and dexterity.

Plan to Encourage Shipbuilding.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have just read your article on the Ship Subsidy bill in to-day's TIMES, and wish to suggest a plan for encouraging shipbuilding without a subsidy. An act of Congress allowing a rebate of 5 or 10 per cent. of duties on all goods imported in ships built in American shipyards by American workmen, under the superintendence and direction of the Navy Department, for American owners, commanded by American officers, manned by American sailors, and sailing under the American flag, would do the job.

There would be a great scramble to build American ships; the Navy Department would see that they were adapted to naval service in time of war, and the people, instead of being taxed for subsidies, would have their taxes on importations reduced.

THE BEAUTIFUL THINGS.

Ripley D. Saunders in St. Louis Republic.

Life's beautiful things are so many,
So free to the humblest one,
That even to count them for thought's delight,
Ah, surely, we'd never be done!
But only because of their plenty,
Because they are ours when we will,
We value them lightly as common and cheap,
And our souls are unsatisfied still!

Reaching out for the things of our dreaming,
With vision so stubborn and blind,
That the rapture which calls to us day by day
Is too near for our seeking to find;
Oh, the loss of it all, and the pity;
And the yearning and hunger and pain,
That we live in a world full of beautiful things,
The beauty of which we disdain!

THE CIVIL SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE MEETS

Preliminary Appointments in New Dependencies Commended.

Carl Schurz's Warning Against Official Pretense of Reform—Dr. Rainsford Criticises New York Society.

The twentieth annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League began yesterday at the City Club, 19 West Thirty-fourth Street.

In the morning there was a joint meeting of the General and Executive Committees. Charles J. Bonaparte of Baltimore presided, with George McAneny as Secretary. At the afternoon session the nominations for office were made, and the election will take place to-day. The report of the Executive Committee was also deferred until to-day. Mr. Bonaparte then read the report of the Special Committee on the Civil Service in Dependencies. It was, in part, as follows:

It is, therefore, with much gratification that the committee is able to report an apparent recognition of these truths by the National Administration, and desires to organize the civil service of our dependencies upon the basis of appointment for merit and tenure during good conduct and efficiency. This has been manifested in the first place by the character of those appointed to high office in the countries we thus hold.

We have further to note with satisfaction the course of the Philippine Commission, by which, if it be persevered in, the merit system will be established in the islands of that archipelago at least as thoroughly and consistently as in any department of Government, Federal, State, or municipal, in the Union.

The ruling of the several departments that the provisions of the Civil Service Law and Rules, being applicable proprio vigore to Federal offices established in the dependencies which would be classified if within the United States, is also a matter to be noted with satisfaction by the friends of good government.

In this connection a serious and delicate question has arisen respecting the status of natives of Porto Rico under the rule restricting admission to the competitive examinations to "citizens of the United States." By the terms of the bill establishing a civil government in Porto Rico, they are recognized as "citizens of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States." This designation which mutatis mutandis would be perfectly applicable to an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, and in itself certainly in no wise excludes American citizenship, has, nevertheless, been held by certain officials to shut them out from the competitive examinations under the civil service law.

The situation of the various territories brought under the control of our Government as a result of the late war with Spain is in some respects very anomalous, has already given rise to grave problems in National policy and Constitutional law, and may yet be productive of results which no one can now forecast with any confidence. But there are, however, certain general principles of government whose recognization is essential to the success of any scheme of administration in these lands. If those principles be disregarded our rule can be neither beneficial nor creditable to us, and must be a source of misery to their inhabitants.

If we forget that public office in those countries is a trust for the sole benefit of their inhabitants; if we make their civil service a place of refuge for needy American politicians with damaged reputations or current coin to pay partisan service, and further support for the dependents and satellites of our public men; if, in short, we repeat the errors of our reconstructional period without the excuse of inexperience which may be pleaded for those errors, and place the Government of the land we have conquered in the hands of carpet-baggers, sure to be neither more competent nor more scrupulous than those of the decade after the civil war, such conduct were mildly criticised if called "a crime against civilization and humanity disgraceful to our Republic."

It would seem that a precedent of great force for the determination of this question could be found in the practice of the commission admitting to examination tribal Indians, who, it is well established, are not citizens of the United States." (Elk vs. Wilkins, 112 U. S., 94.) Since, however, the right of the commission to admit natives of Porto Rico to its examinations has been questioned, the committee suggests the advisability of an amendment to the rules which will permit this, at least in the case of offices to be exercised within the island. That its inhabitants should be debarred from competition for such places they regard as wholly inconsistent with justice and sound policy.

The report of the special committee on superannuation was read by R. H. Dana of Boston. It will be held for publication later. The reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the action of the United States Civil Service Commission in denying access to its records was referred to the Council. The Secretary, George McAneny, reporting for the Committee on Congressional Action, referred in particular to the Veteran Preference bill now pending in Congress, and to which measure the League is strongly opposed.

In the evening Carl Schurz, Charles J. Bonaparte, William Dudley Foulke, and the Rev. Dr. W. S. Rainsford addressed the members of the League at Carnegie Lyceum. Mr. Schurz said in part:

"We have had to do with various Republican and various Democratic administrations, National, State, and municipal, some of which were honestly solicitous to advance the cause of civil service reform, so that we found in their conduct much to praise, which we did most gladly and heartily. But even these sometimes considered us quite unreasonable and disagreeable when to the praise of their good acts we joined, never without regret, our criticism of their occasional slips, our evident duty being to judge, not whether whatever done was difficult or politic, but whether it was genuine civil service reform or not.

"Civil service reform must never permit any one intrusted with power to think that a faithful observance of correct principle in one case can serve as an excuse for a violation of it in another. It must never tolerate tricks of spoils politics under the guise of the forms of the merit system to be passed off as the genuine article. For it must never forget that more harm is done to the cause of civil service reform by false pretense of it than by open attack on it under the undisguised spoils flag."

Mr. Bonaparte said that every American professional politician who "is in politics for what he can get out of it," who makes his living, or advances his interests by pretending to serve the public, no matter what he may call himself, is opposed to civil service reform. And, added the speaker, it is quite right that he should be opposed to civil service reform; if he were not, this would show that the reform was futile.

Mr. Foulke explained the working of the spoils system, and suggested as a remedy that the Constitution be altered so as to extend the Presidential term and make reelection impossible. He was convinced that ultimately a civil service reform would come to Washington from Manila.

Dr. Rainsford said he had recently visited several of the universities throughout the country, and he had found all the young men heartily in favor of civil service reform. The general public, however, was, he thought, indifferent. Talking politics was frowned upon at New York dinner tables, "society preferring to talk balderdash."

The meeting will wind up to-night with a dinner at the Savoy.

LABOR AND THE TRUSTS.

American Federation Refuses to Agree to Radical Resolutions.

LOUISVILLE, Dec. 13.—The conservative element in the American Federation of Labor was dominant throughout to-day's proceedings of the convention. Two resolutions championed by the radical element were voted down by overwhelming majorities. One was a bitter pronouncement against trusts and monopolies in general and the other a declaration in favor of the co-operative commonwealth and Government ownership and control of all means of production and distribution. For both of them much more moderate substitutes were adopted after long debate.

Throughout the debate the proponents of the resolutions claimed Socialism as the only solution of the industrial problems; trades unionism, they said, would last as long as the competitive system prevails, but the competitive system should be done away with and the co-operative commonwealth should take its place.

President Gompers and his colleagues, who opposed the resolutions, took the ground that the federation should not be committed to any political party and that Government ownership is at this time an impracticable theory, with no definite plan for development into a working system.

THE FIRST ASSEMBLY BALL

Society Was Out in Force at the Waldorf-Astoria.

The first Assembly ball of the season took place last evening at the Astoria. For several years, and since the Patriarchs passed into history, the first Assembly ball has been looked upon as the real opening of the Winter season in New York. The Assemblies are the only large subscription balls remaining of the many that were formerly the meeting places for New York society, and the only ones where the members of the several almost distinct sets into which fashionable New York society is now divided meet on the same floor and in the same atmosphere. For this reason the first Assembly, in particular, has come to be a ball of the débutantes, and the small army of fair girls who are informally introduced at teas and receptions during late November and early December make their first bow to society in general at the Assembly.

For the first Assembly ball New York society finally returns from country to town, and there were persons present last night at the Astoria who have not been seen in town since last Spring. For weeks past the event has been eagerly anticipated, and a host of dressmakers have been busily at work preparing the gowns which adorned so many fair wearers last night.

The Assembly of last evening was a larger and more brilliant ball than for many years past, and, in fact, one of the largest in the history of the organization, which was founded in 1881, nineteen years ago. It was also marked by the presence of a larger number of debutantes, daughters of the most prominent families in New York, than any of its predecessors. The floral decorations, which, at the last moment, were altered from the original plan and given a Christmas flavor, were more elaborate than last year.

There were a number of new patronesses, most of them young matrons. The guests were received by four representative women, Mrs. Ogden Goelet, Mrs. Charles A. Post, Mrs. John Jacob Astor, and Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin. As usual at the first Assembly, there were a number of strangers and foreigners present, guests of the patronesses, who are also subscribers. Lander's and the Hungarian Bands played alternately for the dancing, the supper was sumptuous, and the cotillion a spirited one.

The patronesses who were absent for various reasons were Mrs. Astor, Mrs. Edmond L. Baylies, Mrs. Frederick Gallatin, Mrs. Cadwalader Jones, Mrs. Pierre Lorillard, Mrs. Ward McAllister, Mrs. Moses Taylor Pyne, and Miss Whitney.

The ball was not an early one, and it was long after 11 o'clock before it was under way. There was an unusual number of dinners last evening, for the most part given to the débutantes at the ball, and nearly every one was late in arriving. Among the givers of these dinners were Mrs. John Luther Kountze, Mrs. Lewis C. Jones, Mrs. Geraldyn Redmond, Mrs. Albert Barnes Boardman, Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Mrs. J. P. Edwards, and Mrs. Francis H. Leggett.

The guests entered by the west door of the Waldorf, on Thirty-third Street, and passing up the broad marble stairway, entered the east foyer of the Astoria. This stairway was draped with Southern smilax. The hallway to the women's dressing room, the east room, was garnitured with Christmas greens, holly, and Southern smilax. The corridor leading to the large ballroom was decorated with palms and smilax, and the west foyer was done in palms and smilax, brightened with poinsettia, the Mexican Christmas flower. The rotunda was draped with smilax and roses. There were no flowers used in the ballroom. The boxes in the upper gallery were filled with masses of palms, and the fronts of the box tiers were draped with Southern smilax, which was also festooned over the mirrors, in front of which tall palms were placed.

The women who received stood in the large foyer adjoining the ballroom, and the guests, after greeting them, passed into the ballroom. Mrs. Ogden Goelet of the Reception Committee wore a gown of pale green velvet, trimmed with lace and chiffon, simply made but rich. She wore magnificent diamonds and pearls. Mrs. Charles A. Post wore a gown of black velvet, trimmed with point de Venise, and diamonds and pearls. Mrs. John Jacob Astor wore a charming gown of pink satin, heavily embroidered in silver. Her ornaments were pearls. Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin was in a rich gown of white brocade, with lace.

Dancing was general until after midnight, when supper was served in the Myrtle Room and Astor Gallery at small tables, decorated with pink roses. No attempt was made to decorate these supper rooms. The menu was as follows:

Chaud.
Consommé de Volaille.
Terrapene Philadelphie.
Huitres a la Béchamel.
Canards canvas back.
Froid.
Filet piqué a la Jardiniere.
Aspic de foie gras.
Mayonnaise de Volaille.
Salade de Homard.
Sandwiches et Rillettes.
Glaces de fantaisie.
Petits fours. Fruits.
Café.
Moet and Chandon.
Imperial Brut.
Apollinaris.

The cotillion began at 1 o'clock. It was led by Craig Wadsworth dancing with Mrs. John Jacob Astor. There was only one favor figure, and the favors for the women were large salmon pink satin workbags, trimmed with silver lace, and decorated with bunches of artificial flowers of various sorts, and for the men boutonnieres of flowers that matched those used upon the bags.

Dancing was kept up until a very late, or rather early, hour. It was nearly 4 o'clock before the last carriage rolled away from the Waldorf.

There were a number of guests from out-of-town. Among these were Gen. Herbert Eaton and Mrs. Eaton (Miss French) of England, guests of Mrs. Charles H. Mayo; Miss Marion Peabody and Miss Dorothy Forbes of Boston, guests of Miss Whitney; Lowell Blake of Boston, guest of Mrs. Edward Post; Mrs. William Travers of Newport, and Miss Alison Turnbull of Morristown, N. J., guests of Mrs. Cutting; Miss Bradshaw of England, guest of Mrs. Mintum; Miss Marjorie Lea of Philadelphia, guest of Mrs. Luther Kountze; Miss King of Newport and Mrs. Codman of Boston, guests of Mrs. Cadwalader Jones; Miss Flower of New Orleans and the Count and Countess de Laugier-Villars, (Miss Carola Livingston,) guests of Miss Louisa L. Kane; Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Widener of Philadelphia, guests of Mrs. Edmund L. Baylies; Count Carrinaldi and Count Prat, the Italian Vice Consul, guests of Mrs. Thatcher Adams, and Miss Ethel Wright of London, and Prince Henri de Croy of Belgium.

The presence of so many débutantes was the feature of the ball, and these fair girls were the objects of great interest. This was the first ball in the history of New York society to be graced by the presence of triplet débutantes, who were the Misses Ethel, Elsie, and Edith Cryder, the daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Duncan Cryder, and the trio were followed by all eyes throughout the evening. Some of the more prominent debutantes and their gowns follow:

Miss Gallatin was in white lace over silk, the bodice of gold brocade, and a long sash and girdle of gold brocade. There were sprays of gold wheat ears on the shoulder of the bodice, and the same in the coiffure.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Doings of Players, Singers, and Composers in Various Places.

The third act of "Siegfried" was given at one of the Châtelet concerts in Paris on Nov. 25. The correspondent of a London paper says: "The spacious Châtelet Theatre was literally packed from floor to ceiling this afternoon, and I could not see a vacant seat in any part of the vast building. The performance was not only eminently satisfactory, it was in most respects of high excellence. The act had evidently been very carefully rehearsed, for the orchestra, the very backbone of the performance, was admirable throughout. Nor could any fault be found with the solo singers. The fine scene for Erda and Wotan which opens the act received full justice from the trained voices of Mme. Olga de Roudneff and M. Ballard, the latter of whom found a fit partner in the Siegfried of the second scene. Mr. Cazeneuve, who sustained the part of the hero, has a voice of sympathetic quality, and he has the rare merit of speaking his words so distinctly that not a syllable is ever lost.

"He was joined in the final scene with Brünnhilde by Mme. Adiny, who sang the rôle with a passionate fire worthy of all praise. The sentiment and unflagging energy she infused into her part did not prevent her from being absolutely note perfect, and when the difficulty of the music is taken into consideration, this is no slight praise. Mme. Adiny was specially recalled at the conclusion of the long act, and then M. Colonne came in for a genuine ovation most richly deserved. In the earlier part of the programme M. Leopold Godowsky, a pianist of great technical proficiency, gave an excellent performance of Tschaikowsky's first concerto, which was originally introduced to the Parisians by Rubinstein. M. Godowsky plays with true musical feeling, and he made a genuine hit." The success of M. Godowsky in Paris is not at all surprising. They have few pianists over there with such power and brilliancy of style.

Sir Arthur Sullivan's new "Te Deum," for the proclamation of peace, which is now in the hands of the printers, will be published by Messrs. Novello. Nothing has yet been settled concerning Sir Arthur Sullivan's new Irish opera, but, although only two numbers are fully scored, the opera is otherwise so complete that it will almost certainly be produced at the Savoy. It is rumored that the task of finishing the orchestration may be intrusted to Mr. Ernest Ford, who was one of Sullivan's favorite pupils at the Royal Academy of music, and was chosen by the composer to conduct "Ivanhoe" in 1891.

According to Mr. Spark, the Secretary, "The Beauty Stone," which was the least successful of the Savoy operas, was originally intended for a Leeds Festival cantata. It is difficult to comprehend how it could have been utilized for such a purpose. Mr. Spark likewise understands that Sir Arthur had almost completed another cantata for Leeds. Every one will hope that this is the case. Moreover, in a glimpse behind the scenes Mr. Spark discloses a highly interesting fact. At the last festival Sullivan was in indifferent health, and, in view of the risk of his breaking down, an arrangement was made with Dr. Stanford and Dr. Cowen to take his place in case of need. Possibly coming events may thus have cast their shadow before.

It may not, by the way, generally be known that Sullivan at one period of his career advertised for pupils. The following appeared in The Musical World (a paper now defunct) on May 11, 1861:

"Mr. Arthur Sullivan begs to inform his friends that he has returned from Germany. All communications regarding pupils, &c., to be addressed to his residence, 8 Ponsonby Street, Pimlico, S. W."

An interesting letter appears in The Musical Times, in which Sir Arthur Sullivan defends, in a song from "Box and Cox," the use of consecutive fifths. He declares this to be one of those cases in which a rule must be broken for the sake of the effect gained, adding:

"The melody and bass are each moving independently in a sort of fixed progression; if fifths turn up it doesn't matter, so long as there is no offense to the ear, and I confess that the phrase you quote doesn't hurt me."

Sir A. C. Mackenzie has been at work for some time on an opera on the subject of Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth," and the finishing touches to the score were completed a week or so before the recent production of Goldmark's opera on the same subject by the Carl Rosa company.

The general opinion on Goldmark's setting seems to be that the composer found himself hampered by the limitations of the domestic story, in which pathos, humor, and a touch of tragedy are so admirably blended. The book which Mr. Julian Sturgis has provided for Sir A. C. Mackenzie perserves the quaint and delightful character of Caleb Plummer, and the "flowing bowl" in which the toymaker pretends to drown his sorrows is made the subject of a leading motive in the music. It is early days to speak of its production, but it is hoped that a hearing of the work will be arranged for before next season. Julian Sturgis, it will be remembered, wrote the lyrics for Sullivan's "Ivanhoe."

***

A very interesting sketch of Thomas Attwood, who was the only Englishman privileged to be numbered among the pupils of Mozart, appears in the December issue of The Musical Times. Sir Frederick Bridge is the fortunate possessor of some music exercises which show corrections and notes in Mozart's handwriting, and two of these are reproduced in fac simile. A letter from Mozart's widow—afterward Mme. Nissen—is full of quaint English, and begins "Mrs. Nissen, once Mozart, is truly happy to hear from her old friend Mr. Attwood."

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of Its Fifteenth Season in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its fifteenth season in this city at Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was one of that kind which is now familiar at these concerts. It comprised the best elements of musical appreciation to be found in this metropolis, and when those elements are assembled they make something worth consideration even by those other cities which regard New York as the unmentionable place. The programme performed last evening was one characteristic of the catholic taste of Mr. Gericke and the adaptability of his men. It consisted of the first symphony of Brahms, the piano concerto of Schumann, the fourth part of Smetana's cycle of symphonic poems descriptive of his native land, the part entitled "From Bohemia's Groves and Meadows," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." The solo performer in the piano concerto was young Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian.

That this programme afforded a fine and stimulating variety of styles must be apparent to the merest tyro in musical art. Yet it was all of the romantic epoch, and so kept the hearer constantly in the receptivity of a succession of emotional states. At the same time, it cannot be said that there was no appeal to the intellect, for the Brahms symphony is not to be heard with comfort by the light-minded. It is a profound work, and it has its puzzling passages. The last movement, for example, is not to be grasped with facility at a single hearing. But these are not the days of puzzles in Brahms. Most of his great works are thoroughly well known to this public, and at a Boston Symphony concert one may count upon finding all the "Brahmsianer" in their purple and fine linen.

They had a feast of reason and a flow of soul last night. The orchestra has never played anything better here than it played the symphony. Its tone was full of lush mellowness, while at the same time it was so sonorous and so rich in muscularity that it quite satisfied the tonal sense. In phrasing, attack, precision, and unanimity the orchestra was at its best in the performance of the first number. The finale was genuinely inspiring. And what a lovely, sympathetic, and poetic reading it was that Mr. Gericke gave us! Sometimes we have little joy of this conductor's meditative interpretations, but he was filled with the divine afflatus when he studied this C minor symphony of Brahms, a work which must lie close to his heart, or he could never have breathed the breath of life into his reading as he did last night. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of his work, and the applause for it was loud and long.

The Smetana composition has not been heard here very recently, and not often at any period. It is a rich color picture, in which the composer lets loose the pigments of the modern orchestral palette upon a set of themes evidently borrowed from the National storehouse or made in imitation of some of its contents. It is a bright, genial, highly tinted work, sunny in mood, and easy to hear because it calls for no penetrative analysis. Such music, music of the mead, the dance, and the holiday faring, gives a most effective contrast when two such introspective numbers as the Brahms symphony and the Schumann piano concerto are on the programme. The work was admirably played, but the performance of it did not efface the impression made by that of the Brahms music.

In the Schumann concerto Mr. Gabrilowitsch was heard at his best. Honesty compels the addition that he was also heard at his worst. His conception of the entirety of the composition was Mendelssohnian. It was most polite and gentlemanlike. There was nothing in it to "bring the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty." Certainly not many listeners could ever before have heard such a tame and deliberate performance of the last movement. The first movement was better done, and parts of it the young man played excellently, for example, the cadenza, which, though devoid of the proper brilliancy, was done with intimacy of detail and a nice appreciation of its song-like quality. The slow movement was read commendably, but there was a want of atmosphere in it. The corners of the nuances were too much in evidence. The tiling did not flow; it did not sing. But this methodic articulation of a melody is one of Gabrilowitsch's idiosyncracies. He may get over it when he assumes more authority. The orchestra and he were at odds not a little of the time in the concerto, and this made the entire performance deficient in smoothness.

R. G. KNOWLES ARRIVES.

Vaudeville Actor and His Wife Will Play the Keith Circuit.

R. G. Knowles, the vaudeville artist who came to this country under contract to B. F. Keith, arrived yesterday a passenger on the White Star liner Majestic, accompanied by his wife. Mr. Knowles's last appearance in this city was with Augustin Daly's forces, after which he went to London with Hoyt's "A Trip to Chinatown" company.

"During my engagement in this country," Mr. Knowles said last night, "I will appear in a new monologue, which has been tried in London, where I called it 'Trifles That Trouble a Traveler.' It is descriptive of a trip around the world, depicting the various characters one meets. After my American tour, which is for a period of four weeks, I shall return to England and fill engagements which call for my appearance in London and the provinces up to 1903, after which I shall retire from the stage permanently."

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and their daughter also arrived as passengers on this steamer. They will fill a concert engagement in this country, during which time Miss Henschel will make her début on the concert stage.

WHAT IS DOING IN SOCIETY.

Friday will again bear out to-day its reputation as an off day in the society world, and the fact that it is the day after the Assembly ball will also make it still duller. It was nearly 4 o'clock this morning before the fair loiterers had left the Astoria ballroom, and it will be midday before those who danced the cotillion and who do not have to rise early will make their appearance. On the social programme for to-day there are only two receptions, one a coming-out for Miss Dorothy Edwards, to be given by her mother, Mrs. Pierrepont Edwards, (Miss Waterbury,) at her residence, 12 East Forty-sixth Street, and the other the second of two receptions to be given by Mrs. J. Langdon Schroeder for her younger sister, Miss Marie de Neufville. The evening will bring the second performance of "The Cabinet Minister" by the Amateur Comedy Club at the Berkeley Lyceum, and the first meeting of Mrs. Church's dancing class—the Friday Evening Dances—at Sherry's.

The engagement is announced of Cary Talbot Hutchinson, formerly of St. Louis, and who is also well-known in Baltimore, although for some years a resident of this city, and Miss Susan M. Dimock, a daughter of Henry F. Dimock and a niece of ex-Secretary William C. Whitney. Mrs. Dimock having been Miss Susan Whitney. Mr. Hutchinson is a member of the University Club, the Westchester Country Club, the Sons of the Revolution, and the Southern Society. He is related to several prominent families in this city.

Miss Williams will have her cousin, Miss Lulu Peters, as her maid of honor, and the Misses Marion Fish, Anna Dodge, Evelyn Parsons, and Florence Twombly will be the bridesmaids. Mr. Dixon will have as his best man his cousin, Woodward Babcock, and has selected for his ushers Samuel F. Babcock, Jr., Searle Barclay, Maxwell Stevenson, Richard H. Williams, Jr., Bradish Johnson, Jr., and H. H. Hollister, Jr. The wedding will be a large affair, but the reception will be limited to relatives and intimate friends only. Mr. Dixon is a grandson of Samuel F. Babcock.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry O. Havemeyer (Miss Elder) will give a dance on the evening of Dec. 26 for their young daughters, Miss Adeline and Miss Electa Havemeyer, which will be attended by members of the younger set. This dance will be the first notable entertainment that Mr. and Mrs. Havemeyer have given in their beautiful residence, 1 East Sixty-sixth Street. The guests on that evening will, many of them, for the first time have an opportunity to see the wonderful paintings and art objects which fill the rooms and hallways of the mansion, and which Mr. Havemeyer has been collecting for many years. There will be a cotillion and handsome favors.

MYSTERIOUS TRAIN ROBBERY.

Postal Clerk Found Nearly Killed—Mail Pouches Were Rifled—Two Suspects Arrested.

TEXARKANA, Ark., Dec. 13.—A bold robbery on the Cotton Belt Railway occurred to-day at Bassett's, Texas, thirty miles south of Texarkana, on the train coming north, in which Postal Clerk John N. Dennis was almost killed and the mail pouches of his car rifled of their contents. The train left the Bassett's water tank at 6 A. M. The express and mail cars were separated from the others, but the train crew soon had them coupled up again. In the run from there to Texarkana the coaches were uncoupled twice in a very mysterious manner. Upon the arrival of the train here the United States transfer clerk went to the door of the mail car and knocked for the postal clerk to open it. No response was given from the inside. Officials then forced an entrance to the car, and were astonished to find the clerk, John N. Dennis, stretched upon the floor apparently dead. A hurried examination showed that the registered packages had been ripped open and robbed of their contents, the most valuable of which were in the Waco-Memphis through pouch.

A physician was sent for, and it was found that Dennis was alive, but unconscious. An ugly wound in the top of his head told the story. Two hours later he was taken to the hospital, where he revived sufficiently to give the details of the robbery.

Just as the train started at Bassett's Dennis went into the mail car to stir up the fire. When he closed the door he saw two men standing by the stove, one of whom dealt him a terrible blow over the head with a heavy fire shovel. The first blow felled him, and he was then quickly beaten into a senseless condition. He knew nothing more until he was revived in the Texarkana Hospital. He is in a critical condition.

Examination of the car showed that the robbers gained entrance by crawling through a small trap door in the floor of the vestibule. In the vestibule is a crank with which a person can uncouple one car from another, and it is believed it was the intention of the robbers to disconnect and get control of both cars. It is impossible to tell what the robbers secured, but it is believed they made a good haul. Officers are on the case, but there is little to work on, as the men could have left the car at three different places before the train arrived here.

Word reached here at noon that two suspects have been arrested at Naples, near the scene of the robbery, but none of the stolen packages was found. Dennis is an old and trusted mail clerk.

Dance Hall Again Closed.

The dance hall known as McGlory's, at 313 West Fifty-ninth Street, and recently opened by Adam Kessell, Jr., was closed last night. It was said that during the time the hall had been opened less than $20 had been received over the counter.

DEATH LIST OF A DAY.

Gustavus Clark Hopkins.

Gustavus Clark Hopkins, at one time President of the Cotton Exchange, and one of the most popular and best known men in the trade, died early yesterday morning at his residence, 304 West Seventy-seventh Street, from pleurisy. He had been ill for several months. Mr. Hopkins was born in Mobile, Ala., on Feb. 20, 1844, and his associates recall that, as he celebrated his birthday but every four years, he jokingly announced on the Exchange some time ago that he was just approaching his fourteenth birthday. Mr. Hopkins's parents moved to Guilford, Conn., when he was a boy, and some time later he came to New York, where he entered the Importers and Traders' Bank as a clerk.

In 1876 he went into the employ of Hopkins, Dwight & Trowbridge, cotton merchants, and later became senior member of the firm, the style of which was changed to Hopkins, Dwight & Co. Mr. Hopkins became a member of the Cotton Exchange on Oct. 7, 1878, served as Vice President from 1894 to 1896, and as President from

NEW RAPID TRANSIT PLAN

Two Lines Instead of One Proposed for Bronx Borough.

Extension from Lenox Avenue May Cross the Harlem and Run Under Jerome Avenue.

A plan now being considered by the Rapid Transit Commissioners to make some important changes in the subway beyond One Hundred and Forty-first Street developed yesterday afternoon after the regular meeting at which a petition was received from over 300 residents and property owners of the Bronx asking for an extension of the road on or near the line of Central or Jerome Avenue. The petition, which was signed by Edward Elliott, recited that under the present plans of the tunnel road the part of the borough in which the signers live is left without adequate transportation facilities, and they wish direct transit down town.

For some time the Commissioners and Chief Engineer have been considering a project to extend the road along Lenox Avenue, from One Hundred and Forty-first Street across the Harlem and out Jerome Avenue, the terminus to be practically on a line with Bronx Park. If this is brought about it will be done by suspending the building of the link at the Lenox Avenue curve to One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street and Third Avenue, and with the money which would have been used for this construction build the proposed Jerome Avenue extension.

The project includes the erection of the elevated part of the subway from One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street and Third Avenue, as at present proposed, to the terminus at Bronx Park, making connection temporarily for the residents of that portion of the Bronx with the Third Avenue elevated road at One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street. The Borough of the Bronx would thus have two lines, where at least for the present, before the agitation was begun by Bronx residents, but one was seriously considered. The two lines would in this case be entirely separate, the Jerome Avenue people and those living in adjacent territory getting down town by way of the west side line. It is proposed, according to Mr. Parsons, who briefly outlined the foregoing, to immediately begin the construction on the elevated part of the line under the present plans, that is, that portion running from Third Avenue and One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street, out Westchester Avenue, Southern Boulevard, and Boston Road to Bronx Park, terminating at a point near the new Zoological Gardens, and have it ready for the public next year.

The proposition now is at best tentative. It includes, however, the plan originally mapped out to have an independent east line, branching out from Forty-second Street, and the rapid transit people see a possibility and even a probability before long of bringing about this improvement in New York's system of rapid transit.

It will probably be several weeks before the tentative plan is accepted or rejected. The words "temporary suspension" used by Chief Engineer Parsons in speaking of the connecting link between Lenox Avenue and One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street are taken by many to mean abandonment, but Mr. Parsons yesterday refuted this idea.

At the meeting yesterday President Orr stated that he had been over the work with the Chief Engineer and was satisfied with the progress made to date. Mr. Orr then asked if a pro rata amount of speed in construction had been kept up in reference to the stipulated time of four and a half years to complete the road. Mr. Parsons replied that, while some of the subcontractors were relatively a little behind on the basis of time computation, this loss would be made up and that the road would be completed in the time specified. Some of the contractors, he added, will complete their part of the tunnel ahead of time.

Delays so far have resulted from the difficulties the sub-contractors have had in assembling their plants, but next Spring will see every sub-contractor going ahead steadily. Long before that time many engineering difficulties will have been solved, including the Broadway extension plans for four tracks.

A hearing will be held this afternoon at 2 o'clock in the City Hall, Board of Aldermen's chamber, on the proposed change of line at Fort George.

ABSENCE OF FIRE ESCAPES.

Tenement House Commission's Committee Makes Report.

"From a study of these facts, shown by this inspection, we cannot escape the conclusion that the enforcement of the fire-escape laws in this city is of the most lax and inefficient kind."

This arraignment is that of ex-Fire Chief Hugh Bonner and of Lawrence Veiller, respectively a member and the Secretary of the Tenement House Commission, to which they report as a sub-committee of the commission on the inspection, in regard to fire escapes, of tenement houses in the Boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn.

The report states that since 1862 the law has required that all tenement houses existing and to be built shall have adequate fire escapes. There are 80,000 such buildings in the city, and it became necessary for Messrs. Bonner and Veiller to limit their investigation, so that in Manhattan they confined themselves to the Seventeenth Ward, which is bounded by Rivington and Fourteenth Streets and Third Avenue and Avenue B, and in Brooklyn to that portion of its Seventeenth Ward known as Greenpoint. In Manhattan each block was taken up in detail, and when a tenement was found without fire escapes in front it was inspected. In Brooklyn each residence building was inspected.

In Manhattan 920 houses were examined. Of these 98 tenements, or 15 per cent., had no fire escapes at all and 355 had no front fire escapes. There are 2,877 tenements in the ward, so that 23 per cent. of them had no front fire escapes. Of the houses without front escapes, but with rear balconies, 850 had two families on each floor and 32 had two, three, and four, and in some cases six and seven, families on a floor. In buildings with more than two families on a floor it is apparent, the report says, that a number of families had absolutely no chance of escape in case of fire.

The 355 tenements with no front escapes sheltered 4,305 families of 21,525 souls. In 36 per cent. of the structures the floors of the fire-escape balconies were of wood, which, in case of fire, would burn away. In only 15 per cent. were there stairs to connect the balconies, 71 per cent. having but vertical ladders. Such ladders are seldom, in case of fire, used by women and children, who have to be rescued as if there were no fire escapes. In support of this assertion the sub-committee furnishes reports from Fire Chiefs. In 53 per cent. of the cases the fire-escape balconies were found clogged with incumbrances, and in only 13 per cent. was there any evidence of their being kept clear. In 36 per cent. of the cases the openings in the balconies were covered with boards or other obstacles.

Attention is called to the absence of front fire escapes on the better class of flat buildings outside of the Seventeenth Ward, especially on First, Second, Third, Sixth, and Eighth Avenues and cross streets in Harlem. Front and rear fire escapes are urged for every tenement in the city, both in the interest of imperiled tenants and lifesaving firemen. The absence of front escapes is ascribed to the pride of the architect and owner, who do not like to have their artistic sensibilities offended. All tenement house fire escapes should, in the opinion of the committee, have stairs with flat steps and a hand rail. The Building Department regulations require this, but for some years the modification of vertical ladders has been permitted. This department, however, insists on stairs with hand rails for Bowery lodging houses with from 80 to 80 men, while vertical ladders are sanctioned for tenements with 100 to 150 men, women and children. The balcony is generally too narrow. Window to window escape gratings are condemned. The danger from clogged escapes is plainly set forth. The responsibility for their existence is divided among the Fire and Building Departments, so that the law is not enforced properly, and when there is an arrest Magistrates are loath to fine or imprison a poor offender.

In the Greenpoint district, in Brooklyn, 806 houses were examined. Of them, 661 were tenements, of which 283 had no fire escapes, although 242 were wooden structures. Of the 378 tenements with fire escapes only 4 per cent. had front balconies. Rear balconies were found on 295 buildings. On 91 buildings were apologies for fire escapes—a vertical ladder suspended in mid-air by two iron brackets at each story. These were in many instances incumbered with boards, which served to make receptacles for flower pots or boxes. Such buildings, the report says, should be considered as without fire escapes. The balconies on 12 per cent. of the 281 houses were connected by stairs, and in 87 per cent. by vertical ladders. In 53 per cent. the floors of the balconies were of wood. The balconies were more or less incumbered with household articles.

BROOKLYN TRANSIT RUMORS.

Report That President Rossiter Is to be Succeeded by Edward A. Maher Denied by the Latter.

It was stated yesterday in Wall Street by persons whose relations to the parties involved place them in a position to know that a successor to Clinton L. Rossiter, President of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company, will be chosen at the annual meeting on Jan. 17 next, and that Edward A. Maher, now President of the Union Railway Company, known as the "Huckleberry" road, is slated for the place.

This reported determination to change the management is said to be the outcome of the Brady interests in Rapid Transit gaining control. Mr. Brady's interests formerly lay with the Vanderbilt-Flower coterie, but he is understood to have transferred his allegiance to the Whitney-Ryan combination of the Metropolitan Street Railway Company, who are known to favor a change of management in the Brooklyn roads.

Mr. Maher himself declared last night that he knew of no such plan, and that the reports were not true. It had been asserted that Mr. Maher would be succeeded as President of the Union Railway Company by Thomas W. Olcott, a brother of Frederick P. Olcott, President of the Central Trust Company. Mr. Olcott is now Secretary and Treasurer of the Union Company.

It was also stated that there will be a change in the Brooklyn company's Directorate. A number of the present Directors will resign, and Thomas F. Ryan will take the place of one of these. A close friend of Mr. Brady will be another Director.

SOCIETY OF THE CINCINNATI.

The Executive Committee of the Society of the Cincinnati, of which District Attorney Asa Bird Gardiner is Chairman, will hold a business meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria to-day, it being the one hundred and first anniversary of the death of Gen. Washington, the first President General of the order.

The representation will include men well known in their respective States. Nicholas Fish is Secretary of the committee. The other members are Thornton Kirkland Lothrop of Massachusetts, Charles Isham of Connecticut, Talbot Olyphant of the New York Society, Henry Schenk Harris of the New Jersey Society, Francis Marinus Caldwell of Pennsylvania, Oswald Tilghman of Maryland, John Cropper, President of the Virginia Society, and James Simons, LL. D., President of the South Carolina Society.

The principal business of the meeting will be the revival of the New Hampshire, Delaware, North Carolina, and Georgia State societies. The committee will lunch at the Waldorf-Astoria, and in the evening the members will dine as the guests of Col. Gardiner at the Union League Club, and afterward will listen to an address at the Genealogical and Biographical Society by Col. Gardiner on "The Order of the Cincinnati in France."

WOMAN DIES BEFORE A CROWD.

The sight of a priest administering extreme unction to a dying woman in the street drew a large crowd of spectators at Houston and Mulberry Streets yesterday morning. The woman, who was identified after she had expired as Mrs. Theresa Bohming of 134 East Houston Street, was found sitting on a doorstep by a policeman. When the officer asked her what the matter was she told him in a businesslike way to hurry and get a priest, as she was dying.

The policeman, without more ado, did as he was bid, and brought Father Romano of the Church of Our Lady of Loretto, in Elizabeth Street. The officer then summoned an ambulance. Father Romano arrived just in time. As the last words of the religious rites had been spoken the woman's head sank on her breast and she was dead. At this moment the ambulance dashed up, and the surgeon made his way through the crowd. When he pronounced the woman dead the men in the crowd, including many Hebrews, took off their hats and bowed their heads.

It was evident that the woman was on her way to work somewhere when she was taken ill, and sat down on the doorstep.

To Fight the Window Glass Trust.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 13.—The meeting of the Independent Glass Manufacturers, which has just come to a close in this city, promises to have a marked effect upon that industry in the United States. Practically every independent glass manufacturer in the country attended in person, or was represented by proxy at the meeting. The preliminary steps were taken toward the formation of a strong and complete organization, the purpose of which will be to force the American Window Glass Company, better known as the Window Glass Trust, to make terms with the Independent Manufacturers. Otherwise, a war to the death will be inaugurated.

A class in boxing, under an authorized instructor, has been formed at Tufts College, and the Faculty has decided to permit the time spent by students in the boxing class to apply as part of the required college work in physical training.

Cornell freshmen have responded in great numbers to the call for crew candidates. One hundred and twelve men are now receiving indoor instruction in handling an oar. Coach Courtney and ex-Capt. "Freddy" Colson have the freshmen in charge.

Harvard hockey candidates will this year have exceptional advantage in the way of practice. Two new ice rinks 180 by 80 feet have been built at Soldiers' Field, and one of these will be reserved exclusively for the use of the hockey team in the afternoons. The Harvard schedule will probably include games with Yale, Princeton, and Brown.

The Cornell University Athletic Association will give a dinner at Ithaca to all track team candidates Saturday evening, the purpose being to bring the men together to talk over plans for the coming season. Manager Blair, Capt. Hastings, and Trainer Moakley have many innovations under consideration, the most important of which is the building of a new outdoor board running track similar to the ones now in use at Harvard and Dartmouth. The management also plans for an open road race, to take place a few days after the end of the Christmas vacation. The distance will be about five miles, and the race will be open to long-distance runners of all the colleges and preparatory schools. The real work of the track team will begin immediately after Christmas, when the men will begin to get in shape for the big Spring meets. Among the Spring events which Manager Blair is arranging are these with Pennsylvania, Princeton, Columbia, Syracuse, and one of the large Western colleges. It is also the plan of Capt. Hastings and Trainer Moakley to have a handicap meet in the Spring, similar to the one held two years ago, and to also invite all the best college athletes to take part in it.

Basketball has received official recognition at Harvard for the first time this year, and a schedule of eighteen or more games will be played during the Winter. The Yale team will be met at New Haven on Jan. 19, Dartmouth at Hanover, N. H., on Feb. 2, and negotiations are now under way for games with Williams, Amherst, Cornell, Columbia, and Pennsylvania. A freshman as well as Varsity team will be picked, and the 1904 men will probably play a championship match with the Yale youngsters. J. K. Clark '2L., who played on the Yale basketball team, has been elected Captain, and J. F. Jennings, 1901, has been elected manager of the Varsity team. Besides these two men, the following have been retained on the squad: G. B. Fenwick, 1M.; J. W. Gillis, 1902; C. M. Underwood, 1G.; S. Lehmann, 1902; J. H. Barnes, 2G.; R. C. Dorr, 1904; J. C. Linehan, 1904; W. L. Hanavan, 1903; L. C. Moore, 1902; G. H. Fernald, 1903; E. H. B. Humphreys, 1903; H. J. Fitz Simmons, 1903; L. A. Rogers, 1902; L. L. Bigelow, 1903; J. R. Wiseman, 1902; J. T. Doyle, 1903; E. N. Hunting, 1903; M. E. Grush, 1903; C. G. Montross, 1902; J. H. Brown, 1903; E. B. Roberts, 1903; M. V. Taylor, 1L.

AMATEUR BILLIARD TOURNEY.

Cutler and Paige Won in Yesterday's Games at Knickerbocker Athletic Club.

Albert G. Cutler, the young Boston expert, and William Paige, Boston's other representative, were winners of the two games played yesterday in the National Class B billiard tournament, now in progress at the Knickerbocker Athletic Club under the sanction of the Amateur Athletic Union. Neither game resulted in high averages, but both were so closely contested that interest on the part of the spectators ran higher than on any previous day of the tournament.

The afternoon game, which brought together Mr. Paige and Frank Billiter, the Minneapolis champion, was the more sensational of the two. This was due to the splendid brace which in the last few innings brought Mr. Paige into the lead from a handicap of more than eighty points and won for him his only victory in the final round of games. The final score stood 300 to 237, against the Minneapolis man, who had been picked as an easy winner.

Since Mr. Paige's arrival in New York two weeks ago he has played far under the form which he was reputed to possess. The regular spectators of the tourney had, in fact, begun to believe his Boston reputation to be based on myths. But he gained his stroke and true speed yesterday, surprising the gallery late in the game with an exhibition of as fine and nervy billiards as the series has brought forth.

At one stage of the game Mr. Billiter led by 87 points, and it was not until this handicap stared the Bostonian in the face that he settled down to steady work. Then he handled his cue with the touch of a master. Apparently at home with either the close balk-line style of game or wide open-table play, he piled up the caroms by alternate close and open work. His gathering shots, in particular, were opportune and deftly executed.

For nearly forty innings the game went Mr. Billiter's way. On his first time at the table the Minneapolis man ran up a string of thirteen buttons, and in his fourth inning he clicked off forty-seven caroms before resigning the cue ball. This is the third highest run of the tournament, being exceeded only by one of 58 points made by A. D. Ferguson in the qualifying round, and by one of 48 points which Albert Cutler ran up in Tuesday night's game. Strings of 14, 15, 19, and 29 supplemented this brilliant break for the Minneapolis man, while Mr. Paige dallied carelessly along, making frequent goose eggs and infrequent breaks of double figures under 20. In the thirty-eighth inning the score stood 230 to 150 in Mr. Billiter's favor.

Then it was that the Bostonian got down to work. In the thirty-ninth inning he gathered the balls in pretty balk-line style for a break of 15 points, and a string of 10 more followed in his next turn at the table. Then came runs of 26, 35, and 38 points. In sixteen innings he ran out the game from the 150 mark. Mr. Billiter's play in the meantime fell off as rapidly as that of his opponent had been strengthened, and when Mr. Paige brought the game to an end with an unfinished break of 12, in the fifty-fourth inning, he was left 43 points to the rear.

The scores of the game follow, the play being at 14-inch balk line, with the anchor nurse allowed:

Paige—0 10 0 0 2 0 0 7 0 5 8 3 5 8 1 1 0 1 1 6 1 0 1 0 3 3 0 1 0 0 1 0 3 0 5 6 15 10 4 1 26 1 0 35 0 5 0 1 1 38 2 12. Total, 300; average, 5 30-54; high runs, 38, 35, 26, and 20.

Billiter—13 1 3 47 6 4 0 4 7 19 1 0 0 29 1 15 0 2 8 6 2 1 4 6 0 2 0 6 0 0 0 4 12 14 0 3 3 1 6 0 1 3 0 3 0 3 0 4 0 3 2 2. Total, 257; average, 4 45-53; high runs, 47 and 29.

When the young Bostonian, Albert G. Cutler, and Charles D. Schmitt of Chicago came together in the evening game, the spectators were prepared for one of the fastest games of the tournament.

Brilliant shots were frequent, but so were misses on apparently the most facile shots, and it was only the spurt which brought Mr. Schmitt's score within a few points of his victor's during the later part of the game that redeemed it in interest.

Mr. Cutler won the game by but a run of 13 by Mr. Schmitt in the first inning gave him a bare lead up to the twelfth inning, when a run of 20 points put him well in advance of the Chicagoan. Runs of 25 in the fifteenth, and 38 in the seventeenth innings, assured Mr. Cutler the advantage through the remainder of the game. Between the fortieth and fiftieth innings, however, Mr. Schmitt ran up two breaks of 21 points, and one of 15 points. This brought his score up to 262, while that of Mr. Cutler was only 14 points more. Mr. Schmitt had done his best work, however, and when the Bostonian ran out the game with an unfinished break of 12, his opponent's score was left at 275.

Cutler—3 1 8 0 0 4 1 8 0 6 2 9 0 0 2 5 1 3 8 0 1 1 11 1 1 0 5 3 0 0 1 1 36 0 1 2 1 9 9 3 7 4 7 3 21 1 1 0 2 8 0 5 8. Total, 290; average, 5 25-55; high runs, 38, 36, 29, 25, and 21.

Schmitt—13 5 9 0 2 0 2 3 0 2 3 3 2 4 0 5 17 1 9 18 1 2 1 16 1 0 10 2 1 4 0 3 5 4 7 6 2 20 0 21 6 21 3 2 15 0 6 0 3 2 8 0 5 0. Total, 275; average, 5 5-54; high runs, 21, 21, 21, and 20.

W. W. Kellogg of Chicago and Frank Billiter of Minneapolis will meet at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and John A. Hendrick of this city will play Albert G. Cutler of Boston at 8:30 o'clock to-night.

McGOVERN BEAT GANS.

CHICAGO, Dec. 13.—"Terry" McGovern won another victory to-night, when he knocked out "Joe" Gans of Baltimore after two minutes and five seconds of fighting in the second round of what was to have been a six-round bout. Gans put up a very poor exhibition, and was never in it at any stage of the game. McGovern started rushing him at the sound of the gong, and never let up until Gans was counted out. Gans never delivered an effective blow during the fight. George Siler was referee.

During the first round Gans never attempted to mix it. He never made an effore to use his left counter, for which he is so famous, and did nothing but back away with a scared look on his face. In the second round he attempted to fight a little at the opening, but soon resorted to his backing tactics, attempting no return blows and making no effort to block the hot ones which McGovern sent in on his mouth and face. As he was rolled on the floor time and again after every rush McGovern made, he looked around with a helpless expression, as though he had no idea whether it was part of the proceedings for him to rise or remain where he was. In the clinch-down he was on his back for six seconds, rolled over on his face, rose to his left knee, and remained in that position until Siler tapped him on the shoulder, telling him that the fight was over and that he was a loser. He was lifted and was able to walk in a feeble manner to his corner.

As McGovern, smiling and waving his hand, turned toward his corner he was picked up in the arms of his manager and seconds and carried bodily to his chair. In an instant the ring was thronged with cheering McGovern adherents, who gathered around the Brooklyn boy's corner and cheered him again and again. McGovern, panting a little from his exertions, but with no marks of any kind, started to put on his clothes. "He only hit me once," said McGovern, "and that was in the first minute of the first round. He poked his left into my mouth good and hard, but I knew I had him on the next exchange."

FOOTBALL TEAM THEIR GUESTS.

A reunion of the Alumni Association of Columbia College, at which Seth Low was the principal speaker, and the members and coach of the football team of 1900 were the guests, was held last night at Sherry's. Over 100 members of the association, among them Theodore Sutro, John B. Pine, Secretary of the College Board of Trustees; Fred S. Banks, Howard Van Sinderen, and Edward Mitchell, were present. All the speeches made contained congratulations for the football team, and dealt principally with college affairs.

J. Howard Van Amringe, who introduced Seth Low, made a short speech on the necessity for a new College Hall for Columbia, and he read a set of resolutions to the effect that the whole Alumni Association should be formed into a committee for the purpose of raising money for a new hall. These were adopted unanimously.

Mr. Low complimented the football team on its success during the past season, remarking that it was only one instance of the rapid growth of Columbia University.

"When I was graduated from the college it is safe to say that there was no one there who did not come from New York or the immediate vicinity," he said. "At the present time we have students from all over the United States."

Cornelius Dunlea Dead.

Cornelius Dunlea died at his residence, 155 West Seventy-seventh Street, on Wednesday, at the age of forty-seven. He was born in Ireland, and came to this country twenty-five years ago. Some years ago he became a member of the firm of A. B. Farquhar & Co., and was engaged in the introduction of agricultural implements abroad. He leaves a wife and one son.

NEWS OF THE RAILROADS.

Santa Fe Directors Re-elected.

TOPEKA, Kan., Dec. 13.—At the annual meeting of stockholders of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway Company this afternoon the four Directors whose terms had expired were re-elected. They are Edward J. Berwind, New York; R. Somers Hayes, New York; George A. Nickerson, Boston; A. C. Jobes, Wichita. The San Joaquin Valley and Santa Fé Pacific were formally consolidated with the main company.

Brief Railroad Items.

Robert Bacon and James Stillman have been added to the committee of financiers who are to advise the Western Railroad Presidents in regard to the maintenance of rates.

The subject of interchangeable mileage tickets was discussed at a meeting of Western Passenger Agents. The opposition to the plan to increase the minimum mileage is so strong that the scheme will probably have to be abandoned.

Many improvements are to be made in the passenger and freight service of the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern Railroad, which was recently leased by the Baltimore and Ohio.

The engineers of the Chicago and Great Western are reported to be making surveys which confirm the belief that this line will shortly carry out its intention of entering Kansas City over its own rails. At present it uses the tracks of the Kansas City Northwestern under a lease the terms of which are not favorable to the lessee. Besides, the grades on the leased line are quite heavy in many places, making a very costly haul.

A secret session of railroad Presidents was held yesterday at the headquarters of the Trunk Line Association. None of those who attended would say what business had been transacted. Chairman Goddard said they had only come together for a little chat. The following were present: President Truesdale of the Lackawanna, President Walter of the Lehigh, President Callaway of the New York Central, and Vice President Prevost of the Pennsylvania.

LIFE SAVERS REWARDED.

Gold Medal for Boy Who Rescued 120 at Hoboken Fire.

Frank Rattemacher, sixteen years old, of Hoboken, N. J., was last night presented with a gold medal by Col. Wesley Jones, President of the United States Life Saving Corps.

Rattemacher is credited with saving 120 lives, unaided, at the time of the burning of the Hoboken docks on June 30 last. While the North German Lloyd steamships were burning the boy, who was in a large rowboat, the Terror, many times went through the smoke and close to the flames of the burning vessels and rowed men ashore. Four times his boat was overturned.

For similar services Philip Hepkel, also of Hoboken, received a silver medal.

Horton, who represents most of the creditors. The papers are made by Helena Brinkerhoff, trading as Brinkerhoff & Co. The assets are placed at $10,000. The liabilities of the firm are scheduled at $113,020.13, and their only assets are said to be wearing apparel valued at $100. Counsel said that the firm was obliged to become bankrupt on account of the fire which destroyed the place of business several years ago. The insurance companies in which the firm was insured, he said, resisted payment of the indemnity, and gave $20,000 or $30,000 less than the amount covered by the policies. The firm resumed business, but in about two months was obliged to make an assignment.

THE F. HORMANN & SON COMPANY.—A petition was filed in Common Pleas Court No. 2, at Philadelphia, yesterday, by F. Hormann and F. W. Hormann of the F. Hormann & Son Company, Elizabeth C. Hormann, the Consumers' Oil Company, and Samuel B. Gilpin & Co., asking for a receiver. In the petition it is stated that the defendant corporation has an authorized capital stock of $130,000, of which 10,000 shares of the par value of $10 each, constituting a capital stock of $100,000, have been duly issued, full paid and non-assessable; that the property consists largely of real estate and the plant, known as the Jefferson Glass Works, including the material and stock on hand, the bills and accounts receivable. The corporation is indebted upon bills payable and for merchandise to the amount of $37,000, and upon open book accounts to the extent of $8,000.

Heine & Co., $99. It was alleged that they are insolvent and have transferred merchandise and accounts to the value of $3,000. Deputy Sheriff Ahearn has removed the stock on numerous writs of replevin.

Of the liabilities $21,500 are secured by mortgages and by a life insurance policy. The life insurance policy is for $20,000, payable to his wife and children, and is held by E. O. Church as security for a debt of $7,500. Charlotte E. Smith holds a chattel mortgage on paintings for a debt of $6,500, and she also appears in the list of unsecured creditors for $9,000 borrowed money. The assets consist of the life insurance policy and debts due him of $2,318.

ROLLINS GOLD AND SILVER MINING COMPANY.—A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed yesterday against the Rollins Gold and Silver Mining Company of 156 Fifth Avenue, by the following creditors: Charles W. Warren of Middletown, Conn., $2,055; Mary E. Warner of the same place, $5,241, and Frank Brainerd, Trustee, of Portland, Conn., $6,054, all the claims being on notes. It was alleged that the company is insolvent, and on Dec. 5 admitted in writing its inability to pay its debts and willingness to be adjudged bankrupt. This is the third petition which has been filed against the company, the others having been filed on Nov. 15 and Dec. 5, 1899. William J. Walsh represents the present petitioners.

FREDERICK HERZIG.—Frederick Herzig, manufacturer of infants' and children's cloaks at 120 and 122 Wooster Street, has filed a petition in bankruptcy, with liabilities of $27,643 and nominal assets of $26,661, consisting of merchandise, $6,500; accounts, $14,066; fixtures, $600; lots at Woodville, Long Island, $2,000; fifty-eight shares of stock of the Westchester Land Company, $200; cash on hand, $5; cash in banks, subject to liens on unpaid discounted notes, $3,200. There are seventy-five creditors, the largest being the People's Bank, $10,000, which has $1,690 on deposit. Mr. Herzig has been in business for twenty-five years, was formerly in the fur trade, and started the present business in October, 1899. Lewinson, Kohler & Schattman, his attorneys, said that the failure is primarily due to ill-health for the past year, and his condition is such that his doctor and family will not permit him to go on any longer. A meeting of creditors will be held and a settlement offered. Judge Brown has appointed Peter Alexander receiver of the assets.

Confessed Judgment to His Lawyers.

José Antonio Martinez, otherwise known as Domingo G. Martinez, confessed judgment yesterday for $7,515 in favor of Howe & Hummel, lawyers. ELM STREET OWNERS' FIGHT.

Mr. Coler Will Contest the Scheme to Secure the Refunding of Millione.

The property owners who have paid assessments for the widening and improvement of Elm Street will not have the money refunded if Controller Coler has his way. He will try and prevent the resolutions remitting $3,000,000 of assessments from passing the Board of Public Improvements. Controller Coler said yesterday that the plan to return the assessments was wrong, and that he would fight it in every way possible. He said that he attended the meeting of the Board of Public Improvements on Wednesday to bring the matter to an immediate vote and defeat it at once. This was prevented by the resolution of Street Cleaning Commissioner Nagle, postponing the consideration of the matter for two weeks.
Controller Coler said yesterday:
"I would not be a bit surprised if the lawyers who have charge of this work have an agreement with the property owners whereby they will receive from 25 to 30 per cent. for legal fees. This would make a profit of about $500,000, and that would be pretty good money for such an easy matter. The lawyers would get the cash for their own pockets and the taxpayers at large would have to foot the bill.
"I heard that the matter was to be pushed at the meeting of the Board of Public Improvements, and I went there determined to defeat any such plan if possible. It has been laid over. I do not know what the final outcome will be, but I think we can defeat the resolutions.
"The debt-incurring margin of the city will be about $20,000,000 after the new budget goes into effect on Jan. 1. If this plan was put through, it would mean that $2,500,000 would be taken from that margin. The city would not gain anything by refunding the money already paid in for assessments, and it would be a clear waste."

PETITION FOR A NEW STREET.

To Run from Broadway to Lafayette Place—Club Quarters Threatened.

A plan for a new street to run through the block bounded by Broadway, Astor Place, and East Fourth Street was filed yesterday in the office of President Coogan. The petition for this improvement was signed by many residents and business men in the neighborhood. The street as planned runs through the building used for boxing bouts by the Broadway Athletic Club. The building was once an amusement place called "Old London Streets." It is proposed to extend the street at this time east only as far as Lafayette Place.
The Astor Library Building stands directly in the line of the proposed new street, and it is expected that when the new library building has been completed at Forty-second Street, the city will acquire the property and run the street through to Fourth Avenue. The petitioners asked the Local Board of Improvements to influence the Board of Public Improvements to approve the plan. A meeting will be held in President Coogan's office on Dec. 21 at 1 o'clock, when the matter will be discussed.

Want Receiver for a Gas Company.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 13.—A petition has been filed in the Court of Common Pleas asking that a receiver be appointed for the Federal Natural Gas Company and that it be enjoined from disposing of any of its property or stock. The application was made by representatives of the Hocking Valley and Lake Erie Company. The applicants charge that fraud has been perpetrated, and that the purposes of the gas company were misrepresented to them in securing certain rights from the railroad company. A temporary injunction was granted by Judge Evans, who set Dec. 22 for the hearing for receiver and permanent injunction.

MARKET MOVEMENT.

The stock market yesterday was under pressure all day long, room traders selling stock aggressively from the opening hour. Anticipation of a bad bank statement on Saturday and disturbing reports, not confirmed, of financial trouble in Berlin—one story told of a panicky condition in the German capital—were used as pretexts for the crusade against market values. Yet while prices sagged, they did not go off materially, while the buying was accounted better than the selling.
The coal stocks were the strongest on the list under the leadership of the Erie issues. Now that the Pennsylvania Coal Company deal is finally completed, Wall Street realizes its full significance. This Pennsylvania Coal Company transfer is, however, understood to be but the forerunner of other important developments in the general coal field.
Sugar Trust stock was a conspicuous security, showing marked weakness during the day. This was at first attributed to the reported continued illness of President Havemeyer, but after the close of business it developed that new opposition to the trust is threatened by the Arbuckle Brothers and by Philadelphia interests. It is now said that it was a realization of the seriousness of this opposition that was the principal reason for the failure of the Sugar Trust Directors at their meeting recently to increase the Sugar Trust dividend.
Though the Saturday bank statement will be unfavorable, it is noticeable that there has been no calling of loans to speak of.

READING SHARES were bought by brokers credited, as on preceding days, with active dealings for Mr. Morgan and his friends. Interests identified with the property claim that it is in the strongest position of any of the coal roads, saying that, on the basis of the Pennsylvania Coal Company transfer, the 100,000 acres of coal lands of the Reading Company, bought thirty years ago by the then President Franklin B. Gowan, are now worth at the least $300,000,000.

ATCHISON ISSUES continued to show strength, in spite of selling by room traders, who have been steady sellers of the securities since the telegraphers' strike began. Reports yesterday in respect to the strike were that it was practically ended. The earnings of the system for the first week in December show an increase of $56,000 over the same week last year.

WABASH SECURITIES were decidedly strong and active under buying for London account and by brokers identified with one of the leading trust companies of the city. Beyond a repetition of the report that new traffic arrangements had been arranged for that would benefit the system financially, and that Vanderbilt interests had been recent buyers of the stocks, there was no development to explain the buying.

ERIE STOCKS were the leaders of the market on the announcement that the purchase of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, as reported, had actually gone through. The buying of all the securities was on a very extensive scale, much of it coming from Morgan interests.

WHEELING AND LAKE ERIE shares were again bought by Standard Oil brokers, but beyond the statement that the buying was in connection with new plans of development of the Ohio coal fields, no reasons for the purchases were disclosed. Action is shortly to be taken on the first preferred dividend.

STEEL STOCKS were inclined to sell off on profit taking, though no unfavorable news developed. In their weekly report on the iron trade, Rogers, Brown & Co. say:

The Eastern pig iron markets are more quiet, as was to have been expected after six weeks of great activity. The time of the year is approaching for annual inventories, and it is not expected that there will be further considerable buying until after the new year opens. Prices have remained firm. Furnaces for the most part are well sold. Virginia furnaces have been seriously hampered by lack of coke. The active demand for coal makes it undesirable for the coal companies to manufacture coke at present prices.
There has been a further decline in English iron, carrying Scotch brands to about 60 shillings. This is a drop of 10 shillings in about three months. Taking this in connection with the improvement on this side, it is not to be expected that the export trade will amount to much for some time to come. In finished forms, such as bridges, locomotives, wire, agricultural, and other machinery, etc., there is no sign of any considerable slacking in foreign demand. It is well understood in the trade that in the crude form of pig iron, steel billets, &c., only exceptional conditiune admitted of business beyond narrow limits.
Evidence is plenty that the melt of iron is large in nearly all departments of the industry, and as the year draws to a close every indication points to a still larger consumption in the new year.

The early strength of Delaware and Hudson yesterday, apart from the Pennsylvania Coal Company deal, was on the report that the next dividend on the stock will be at the rate of 6 per cent., instead of 5 per cent., as at present. This cannot be confirmed.

The Finance Committee of the American Bridge Company yesterday recommended to the Board of Directors the declaration of a dividend of 2% per cent. on its preferred stock, payable Jan. 24, 1901.

Call money yesterday fell to the lowest rate it has reached for some time, dropping at one time toward the close of the day to 3 per cent., and closing at 3½ per cent. The highest figure reached was 6 per cent., with most of the day's loans made at 6 per cent.

No less than $10,000,000, representing Standard Oil dividends, will be paid out in a day or two.

THE LONDON MARKET.

LONDON, Dec. 13.—Money was undiminished to-day, owing to heavy Government disbursements. The improvement in the demand for Stock Exchange requirements and the possibility of gold shipments in the event of Continental exchanges turning adversely upheld discounts, though the tone was easier.
Business on the Stock Exchange was quiet, the weather having a depressing effect. Consols were fairly firm. The fact that there was no rise in the Bank rate helped them somewhat. It is believed, however, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer may have to raise more money before February.
Americans opened dull and steadied. There were a few fractional advances. The announcement of the dividend of Northern Pacific was followed by a few realizations. Erles were strong. Kafirs were easier on the disappointment caused by the failure of the British to capture Gen. De Wet.

In Continental Centres.

PARIS, Dec. 13.—Business on the Bourse to-day opened irregular. Rentes were in large demand, but they afterward reacted, internationals following. Portuguese were in great favor, but later they were generally heavy. Banks were weak, especially Banque de Paris. Industrials and tractions were easier. Rio Tintos relapsed sharply on the decline in copper. Kafirs reacted in response to London.
Three per cent. rentes, 102 francs 5 centimes for the account. Exchange on London, 25 francs 9½ centimes for checks.
Spanish fours closed at 70.02½.
The weekly statement of the Bank of France shows the following changes: Notes in circulation decreased 2,050,000 francs; Treasury accounts current decreased 15,575,000 francs; gold in hand increased 1,675,000 francs; bills discounted decreased 29,975,000 francs; silver in hand increased 400,000 francs.

BERLIN, Dec. 13.—On the Boerse to-day home funds and internationals were firm, Spanish fours were easier, Americans and Canadian Pacifics were maintained, and locals were weak in sympathy with the decline in industrials.
Exchange on London, 20 marks 41½ pfennigs for checks. Discount rates—Short bills, 3½ per cent.; three months' bills, 4⅝ per cent.

MADRID, Dec. 13.—Spanish 4s closed to-day at 77.70. Gold was quoted at 33.85.

BOSTON STOCK MARKET.

Special to The New York Times.
BOSTON, Dec. 13.—The market was steady to-day, with continued strength in spots. Utah Mining lost ⅛, to 33¼, later 33⅜. Tri-Mountain ran up to 18⅞, later 18, and still later 18½, on comparatively large dealings. Other mining shares were decidedly dull and neglected. Massachusetts Electric continued in good demand, over 4,000 shares of the common selling in the morning, the price touching 25½; the preferred sold at 81. American Woolen also maintained interest. East Boston Land strengthened to 9⅝. Tube, Westinghouse, and some railway shares were in good request, and fair business was done in Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, Federal Steel, Atchison, and Sugar. American Telephone rose 2, to 156, in late trading. Baltic hardened ½, to 29. United Gas seconds rose 2, to 50. Kansas City, Memphis and Birmingham incomes were in demand at 75@74. The market closed generally firm, with no diminution of the basic strength and prevailing confidence of the last week or so.
On call, new money is quoted at 4½@5 per cent., with the latter figure the more general. Collateral loans are quoted at 4½@5 per cent. On the very choicest collateral, money outside of National banks might still be obtained at from 4 to 4¼ per cent. for six months.

Railroad Stocks.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

Trading in the outside market yesterday showed considerable activity, and was accompanied by a number of advances of importance. In some parts of the list prices were weaker than on the preceding day, but as a whole quotations were well maintained. The phenomenal advance in the stock of the Pennsylvania Coal Company was discussed with much interest throughout the day. For the most part the strong issues were the stocks which for the past two or three days have held the places of most prominence. The copper stocks were fairly active but irregular.

***

PENNSYLVANIA COAL attracted attention from the opening of the market until its close. From 600, which was Wednesday's bid for the stock, the bid was advanced to 615 before the first transaction was made. Then steadily and with extraordinary sharpness the price advanced 125 points to 740. The transactions made during this rise amounted to about 1,000 shares. At the close small lots of the stock were offered at 740, and 730 was bid, showing a net gain for the day of 130 points. The buying was said to be mostly for the account of J. P. Morgan & Co., and brokers usually acting for that house in the outside market were the chief buyers of the stock.

***

UNITED RAILWAYS OF ST. LOUIS again displayed much strength, and all the issues of this group advanced materially. The preferred stock sold up to 70, and closed at 69¼ bid, a net gain of 1¾ points. The bonds closed with a net gain of half a point, at 85¾ bid, and St. Louis Transit, after selling as high as 21¼, closed at 20¾ bid, against 20½ bid the previous day.

***

RUBBER GOODS common, on transactions that aggregated about 1,000 shares, sold up to 30¾. The preferred stock made a net gain of a full point, closing at 81½ bid.

***

ELECTRIC BOAT was irregular. It opened strong, but later in the day was in rather poor demand. The common stock sold at 24½ and closed at 24 bid, a decline of 1¼ points. The preferred sold early in the day at 46½ and 46, but later was offered at 46½ with no better bid than 43. This was four points below the final bid of Wednesday. In neither of the issues were the transactions large.

***

MEXICAN NATIONAL CONSTRUCTION preferred was traded in to the extent of about 1,000 shares between 13½ and 13. It closed unchanged for the day at 13 bid.

DISTILLING OF AMERICA was firmer and fairly active. The common stock sold for about 1,000 shares between 6 and 6½, and closed with a slight net gain at 6½ bid.

***

AMERICAN BICYCLE common sold to the extent of 500 shares or more at 7. The preferred stock sold at 28.

***

TELEPHONE, TELEGRAPH AND CABLE was very weak. It sold at 3, and was afterward offered at that price, with 2½ bid. It showed a net loss of one point.

***

BRITISH COLUMBIA COPPER showed trading in about 1,300 shares. It closed with a fractional net gain. The other copper stocks were relatively quiet.

***

Closing quotations yesterday, compared with those of the previous day, were as follows:

THREW AWAY GOLD PIECES.

Drunken Man with Large Bank Roll Arrested in Brooklyn.

Special Policeman Hanslein last night had his attention attracted to a crowd of men and boys at Grand and Roebling Streets, Williamsburg, who surrounded a middle-aged man, who was amusing himself by throwing away $5 gold pieces and watching the crowd scramble for them. Hanslein saw the man was drunk, and took him to the station, where he described himself as Conrad Anderson, and said he was forty years old. He refused to tell where he lived.

In the man's pockets were one hundred German notes, $1,550 in foreign gold coin, and $272 in American currency. There was also a bank book on the Seamen's Savings Bank calling for $4,000, as well as a passage ticket on a Hamburg line steamer sailing to-morrow. He was locked up for safe keeping.

Anderson first attracted attention by gathering around him a crowd, whom he harangued about his trip to Germany. After telling them that he had made a barrel of money as a contractor, he told them he would demonstrate it. He then pulled out a handful of $5 gold pieces and began throwing them to the people. There was a mad scramble for the money, and men, boys, and the few women who were in the gathering punched one another to get possession of the money.

This seemed to delight Anderson, who laughed heartily. It is not known how much money Anderson had thrown to the crowd before Hanslein interfered.

WHISKY IN THE CANDY.

Schoolboys Appear in Classroom the Worse for Liquor.

When Miss Greer, Assistant Principal of the public school on West Fifty-third Street, arrived at the school last Tuesday morning and began her duties she gradually became aware of the odor of whisky permeating the schoolroom. She became horrified, as the day wore on, to find that the odor increased, until the place began to smell like a barroom. When the first boys' class was called the approach of the members was heralded by an atmosphere so suggestive of the rum demon that the bewildered teacher began a rigid investigation.

This class was the spelling class, and when Frank Kalisch was given the word "notice," he hesitated a moment, and then responded:

"No-o. no, tsch, notsch."

James Sullivan could not spell the word at all, and the strong breaths and flushed faces of the two boys stamped them as the conveyers of the disreputable odor.

They confessed that they had been buying candy containing drops of brandy of Giovanni, an Italian, who keeps a candy store at 371 West Fifty-second Street. Miss Emma Egbert, the School Superintendent, was notified, and she sent for Detective Dale of the West Forty-seventh Street Station. The boys were sent out to buy some more of the candy, and they returned with 2 cents' worth eight pieces, which the candy was sent to the Board of Health for analysis, and word came back that it contained alcohol. Giovanni was arrested, and when arraigned yesterday in the West Side Court Miss Greer said that she would be satisfied if he were warned to desist from selling the children the wicked candies, and the Magistrate discharged him with a severe reprimand.

Patrick's "Secret Trust" Not Explained

The so-called "secret trust" agreement by which Albert T. Patrick, the lawyer now in the Tombs waiting trial for forgery, was to dispose of the bulk of the estate of William Marsh Rice was not made public yesterday as agreed by his lawyers two weeks ago when they filed the will, which gives Mr. Patrick nearly all of the millionaire's property. Max E. Harby, counsel for Patrick, says that the document will not be produced until Patrick is put on trial for forgery.

COL. ASTOR'S EAST SIDE BLOCK.

Sold at Request of Tenants, Who Got It at Their Own Terms.

The recording yesterday of the last of the deeds by which Col. John Jacob Astor transfers to various buyers the properties in the block bounded by Avenue A and First Avenue, Fourth and Fifth Streets has brought out some further facts regarding what was in many ways considered a remarkable real estate transaction. Douglas Robinson, through whose firm negotiations were conducted, said that the total of the considerations for which the fifty-two parcels were transferred is nearly $900,000.

Col. Astor had not thought of disposing of the block until he began to receive numerous requests from the tenants of the property asking that an opportunity to purchase be afforded them. Col. Astor acceded to the request, but only under certain conditions. He decided that the tenants must purchase directly from him, and that he would allow no middleman or operator to reap a handsome profit from the deal. Furthermore, it may be stated, he did not take advantage of the highest appraisals of the property, and it is a fact that the prices paid for the lots were those fixed by the tenants themselves.

The only stipulation that Col. Astor made was that the entire block should be taken. Some tenants were unable to buy the lots which they occupied, but in these cases, which were not numerous, Douglas Robinson & Co. found investors in the shape of trustees for estates, who were only too willing to acquire such property, and the entire block was absolutely sold.

REPORT OF SALE DENIED.

Old Real Estate Exchange Building Has Still to Find a Purchaser.

A report current yesterday was to the effect that the old Real Estate Exchange Building, 59 to 65 Liberty Street, had been sold by the Central Realty Bond and Trust Company, which corporation acquired the property about two years ago. Henry Morgenthau, President of the company, said that no contracts had been signed, and that there was not even a verbal agreement which would justify him in saying that the property had been sold. Regarding the prospective buyer, Mr. Morgenthau would say nothing except that, so far as he knows, it is not the Chamber of Commerce.

It has been generally known for some time that this property has been among those favorably regarded by the Chamber of Commerce as the site for its new building. Morris K. Jessup, President of that organization, when inquiry was made last evening regarding the rumor affecting the Real Estate Exchange property, said that he knew nothing about it, and added that there was nothing to be said as yet about the site of the new Chamber of Commerce Building.

REAL ESTATE TRANSFERS.

In the following list "mtg" stands for mortgage and "R S" for revenue stamps. The war revenue law provides that stamps shall be placed on all conveyances at the rate of 50 cents for each $500 of consideration. This "consideration" has been held to mean only the equity above the mortgage, except in the rare cases where the purchaser assumes payment of the mortgage. The amount of the mortgage plus 1,000 times the value of the revenue stamps on the conveyances should therefore show the true consideration:

CHINA'S EMPEROR AGREES TO TERMS

Ten of the Conditions Acceptable, It is Said.

FORTS TO BE DESTROYED

Indemnity, Apology, and Permission for Foreign Troops to Hold Lines of Communication Among Them.

TIEN-TSIN, Dec. 14.—According to credible Chinese sources of information Emperor Kwang-Su will agree to the following ten demands of the powers:

First—Indemnity to the amount of 700,000,000 taels, (about $500,000,000,) payable within sixty years and guaranteed by the Ilkin.

Second—The erection in Paking of a suitable monument to the memory of Baron von Ketteler.

Third—An Imperial Prince, a near relative of the Emperor, to go to Berlin to apologize and express regret for the murder.

Fourth—Foreign troops to hold the lines of communication between Taku and Peking.

Fifth—Punishment of the Boxer officials.

Sixth—Candidates from districts where anti-foreign outrages have been perpetrated not to be allowed to compete in the Chinese examinations in Peking for five years.

Seventh—Abolition of the Tsung-li-Yamen.

Eighth—Foreign envoys to have access to the Emperor at all times.

Ninth—Importation of arms and ammunition into the Province of Pe-chi-Li to be abolished.

Tenth—The land and sea forts between Shan-hai-Kwan, Taku, and Peking to be destroyed.

BERLIN, Dec. 14.—A private dispatch from Count von Waldersee says the negotiations for settlement with China are seriously under way, the initial obstacles having been overcome and full accord existing between the Ministers of the powers at Peking.

The Chinese plenipotentiaries, the dispatch also says, find no further difficulty in communicating with the Court direct, telegraphic connection now existing between Peking and Sian-Foo via Shanghai.

PEKING, Dec. 13.—Li-Hung-Chang and Prince Ching have sent an official notification to the Ministers that they have received the promised documents authorizing them to act on behalf of China in the peace negotiations and announcing that they are ready to proceed so soon as the Ministers desire.

The fact that Sir Ernest Mason Satow, the British Minister to China, has not yet received authority from his Government to sign the joint note causes astonishment here, as it is felt that, all the other powers having agreed, there cannot be anything in the joint note to cause Great Britain to object sufficiently to make her refuse to sign.

Mr. Conger says he believes China will immediately accept the terms imposed, and that she has it in her power to comply with the majority of them before Spring, while the others can wait.

On account of the frost, neither will the Court be able to return to Peking nor will the troops be able to leave here until April, when, if the peace conditions are complied with, it is believed all the allied forces, except the legation guards, not to exceed a hundred men for each power, will leave Peking, remaining until the Autumn on the coast between Taku and Shan-hai-Kian. Mr. Conger personally believes that the Chinese have been taught a lesson by the looting.

Col. Tullock reports the discovery of the body of the man who gave the British information regarding the hidden treasure. He had been decapitated. The British have not yet reported the discovery of the treasure, but their return is expected to-morrow.

ATTACK A FRIENDLY GENERAL.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—"The Germans are still following a policy of extermination," says a dispatch to The Standard from Tien-Tsin, dated yesterday. It adds:

"A German force has just returned from an expedition against Gen. Mei (?) at Tsan-chow-Foo, on the Grand Canal, after routing his troops, plundering his baggage, and releasing some dangerous Boxer prisoners he had taken. These proceedings are regretable, as Gen. Mei has all along been active in suppressing the Boxers and defying the Empress Dowager."

The Times publishes the following from Tokio, dated Dec. 13:

"Japan's policy in China appears to be based equally on popular sentiment and political expediency. The barbarous behavior of the Russians, especially the atrocious treatment of women and children, amply confirmed from other sources, has produced intense disgust, which is enhanced by the silence of Western public opinion, in contrast with the severity of Western comment upon Japan's action at Port Arthur six years ago. Hence there is a distinct reaction here in favor of leniency toward the Chinese."

DETAILS OF THE COURT'S FLIGHT.

VICTORIA, B. C., Dec. 14.—Papers from China that have reached here give interesting details of the escape of the Chinese Court from Peking.

According to these accounts, the Emperor, Dowager Empress, and party were insufficiently supplied with clothing and had no provisions of any kind. They were accompanied by an armed guard of 100 eunuchs. They reached one of the northern gates, which was closed by Chinese fleeing from the city. In order to prevent a delay the eunuchs fired several volleys upon the crowd, killing a considerable number, and then the carts conveying the Imperial party were driven over the bodies of the slain. By evening the cortège reached Hua-ia-Sien, where Magistrate Wu went out to meet it and escorted his imperial guests to his yamen.

The Empress, shivering with cold, begged the Magistrate to supply her with additional clothing. He replied that to his regret, being a Chinaman, he had no Manchu female attire available, whereupon the Empress said that it was no time for distinction to be made between Manchus and Chinese, and that she was quite willing to don Chinese clothes. The Empress proceeded to bewail her sad fate. "Never before," she said "in the history of the dynasty had Imperial persons suffered such dire humiliation and discomfort."

DEPOSITORS IN HARD LUCK.

Drew $1,650 from Harlem Savings Bank and Lost $1,250—Run Checked.

The run on the Harlem Savings Bank, One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Street and Third Avenue, continued yesterday, though the number of depositors waiting to withdraw their money was much smaller than on the previous days. When the institution closed its doors for the day, at 3 o'clock, there were only a few outside, and President Charles Tooker gave out a statement that $110,000 had been withdrawn during the day, $3,000 taken in on deposit, and five new accounts opened.

One depositor, who thought his money was more secure in his own pocket than in the bank's vault, discovered his mistake too late, and is now mourning the loss of $1,250. The depositor was John Harmon, a produce dealer at 681 East One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Street. He stood in the line for about two hours before he reached the paying teller's window, and then withdrew $1,250 which belonged to his mother and about $400 of his own money. In one pocket of his overcoat, he says, he placed his mother's money and in the other his own. Then, according to his own statement, made to Detective Buckridge of the West One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street Police Station, he started for the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street station of the Third Avenue elevated road, near by. In going up the steps he put his hand in his overcoat pocket to see if his mother's money was safe, and was horrorstricken to find it empty. He did not know whether he lost the money or his pocket was picked.

Another incident, of a rather amusing character, occurred when an aged depositor of the bank named Mrs. Butler, who had withdrawn her money, came back to the bank weeping and declaring that the paying teller had not given her the amount which her bank book called for. In reaching the window Mrs. Butler thrust back the roll of bills she had received and told the teller to count it. He did so, and, comparing it with her book, found it to be correct. The woman would not believe it at first, but when there were pointed out to her two five-hundred-dollar bills, the first she had ever seen, which she had counted as twenty-dollar bills, with a number of twenties she had received, her sorrow changed to joy and she left the bank with a great load lifted from her mind.

As early as 7 A. M. a crowd of anxious depositors, about 70 per cent. of whom were women, gathered about the doors. The wind was especially keen on the corner where the bank is situated, and the crowd was shivering and blue with cold. Several sharpers, who had secured good positions near the head of the line, and, taking advantage of the anxiety of some of the more ignorant depositors, sold their places for as much as $3. One woman paid $2 for a position in the line seventy-five feet south of Third Avenue, on One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Street. One shabby-looking individual with a position in the middle of the line was caught bargaining with a woman for it by a policeman. When the fellow failed to produce a bank book he was pulled out of the line and warned that if he was caught in the vicinity he would be locked up.

President Tooker, after the close of the bank, said that a story that the bank had sold securities to get money was not true in the sense it implied. Some Government bonds, he said, bearing a small amount of interest, were sold for the purpose of investing the money realized in securities paying a higher per cent. This, he said, was for the financial benefit of the depositors.

BIG STORM IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Much Damage to Telegraph Wires and Other Property.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 14.—One of the most severe storms that ever visited San Francisco broke over the city at an early hour to-day and has raged in fitful gusts, rain and wind sweeping over the city with unusual violence, accompanied by thunder and forked lightning, a rather unusual occurrence in this city. During the height of the storm several houses were overturned by the wind, fences blown down, and other damage done. One of the great receiving tanks of the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company was struck by lightning, the gas taking fire. No one was hurt in the explosion, but the tank was demolished.

During the storm this city was entirely cut off from telegraphic communication with the rest of the world, the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Companies losing every wire out of San Francisco. The damage is being repaired rapidly. Some damage was done in the mountains, but nothing definite can be stated as to its extent. The telephone company also lost many of its long-distance wires.

So far no marine disasters of any moment have been reported. On the bay several boats were capsized, but no one was drowned, so far as is known. Several vessels dragged their anchors. Reports from points at short distances from San Francisco tell of buildings blown over and unroofed, chimneys blown down, and other damage done, but so far no fatalities are known. The storm ceased almost entirely at noon.

HENRY ZEIMER CONVICTED.

Jury in General Sessions Finds Divorce Mill Man Guilty.

Henry Zeimer, charged with subornation of perjury in inducing May Thompson and Mrs. Byrde G. Herrick to perjure themselves in the suit for divorce brought by the latter against her husband, W. C. Herrick, was found guilty in General Sessions yesterday, after the jury had deliberated for three hours.

Zeimer was convicted upon the evidence of the two women, who made full confessions to the District Attorney. Zeimer will be sentenced Wednesday.

PERISHED IN A SNOWSTORM.

Rochester Man Overcome While Returning to His Home.

ROCHESTER, Dec. 14.—The dead body of James M. Leonard, aged seventy-four, of 101 Jones Street, was found, frozen stiff, lying in the snow on the boulevard, three miles south of Charlotte Village, early this morning.

Mr. Leonard went to Charlotte last evening with the Odd Fellows of this city, to attend the exercises and witness the Past Grand contest held by that lodge of Odd Fellows at Charlotte. It is supposed that after the exercises he started to walk to the city. He probably became confused in the heavy storm raging at the time, and, being unable to make his way north on State Street, turned up a side street to the boulevard. Here he fell from exhaustion and died from exposure.

He had been Past Grand Master of Toronto Lodge of this city for the last forty-five years.

EAST SIDE JEWELERS ATTACKED AND ROBBED

Both Are Knocked Senseless with Murderous "Blackjacks."

The Bold Robberies Occur at Widely Separated Points—Small Shopkeepers in a Panic.

Two bold robberies in east side jewelry shops, at widely divergent points, were affected within a couple of hours of each other yesterday, apparently by the same men. In both cases the victims were first attacked and rendered unconscious with a "blackjack."

At a few minutes before 10 o'clock two men entered the little jewelry shop of Julius Reisner, at 568 Second Avenue. The proprietor, a bachelor, lives in the rear of the shop. The men asked to see some watch chains, and Reisner took out a tray containing a number of a cheap variety.

"How much is that?" said one of the men, picking up a chain.

"Seventy-five cents."

"Well, I'll take it. Wrap it up."

The jeweler was about to comply when the man suddenly drew a "blackjack" from his pocket and struck him with it. The blow stunned him. A second and a third followed, and Reisner fell to the floor. Then the men carried him to the rear of the shop, tied his hands and feet, and gagged him. They then secured his keys, with which they opened the safe. This they rifled.

Some time later Reisner regained consciousness and succeeded in slipping the ropes off. He made his way to the street and told his story to a neighbor, who notified the police of the East Thirty-fifth Street Station. An ambulance was summoned and Reisner was sent to Bellevue, where it was found that he had several scalp wounds and severe contusions of the body. When seen in the hospital, Reisner told the story of the attack. One of the men was tall, he said, with a black moustache, and the other of medium height, and smooth face.

"They got over $200 in cash," said Reisner, "and more than a thousand dollars' worth of diamonds and other jewelry."

About two hours after the attack on the Second Avenue jeweler, Zachariah Frank, an aged jeweler of 12 Market Street, looked up from the watch that he was mending to see a tall, black-mustached man standing before him.

"How much do you pay for eighteen-carat gold?" asked the man.

"Let me see the gold," said the jeweler.

"You let me see your money first," was the reply, and then Frank grew suspicious. He is eighty-three years old, but is still a man of some strength. Ordering the stranger out, he tried to enforce the order with a push. Some one on the outside closed the door and held it tightly. The stranger then pulled a "blackjack" from his pocket and struck the old man on the head until he fell senseless, the man's companion, in the meantime, coming in and gathering up several watches that were being repaired.

Frank, when he recovered, managed to crawl out into the hall, and a neighbor summoned the police of the Madison Street Station. The Jeweler was taken to Gouverneur Hospital, where it was found that he had six scalp wounds. The old man lives with his two daughters. They were away at work when the robbery occurred.

Frank said last night that he was beaten and robbed a year ago. He believes that his assailants yesterday were the same men who visited his shop on the former occasion.

The frequency of robberies in small east side jewelry shops has occasioned great alarm among the proprietors. They believe that there is an organized gang at work.

A similar robbery in which two men were engaged occurred at 168 Cherry Street on Dec. 4. Robert Kelly, one of the men, was indicted by the Grand Jury yesterday.

TRAGIC DEATHS SHOCK PARIS.

Edmond Tarbé des Sablons and His Wife Expire Suddenly in Dramatic Circumstances.

PARIS, Dec. 15.—Literary and social circles were greatly shocked at the announcement of the simultaneous death of M. Edmond Tarbé des Sablons, the well-known man of letters and playwright, and his wife, which occurred yesterday under unusually dramatic circumstances.

A servant, on entering their bedroom in the morning, according to regular custom, found M. Tarbé supporting his wife's head in one hand, while with the other he held a basin, into which she was vomiting blood. The servant withdrew at a sign from M. Tarbé that her services were not required.

An hour later, groans issuing from the room, a relative entered and found the lady dead in bed. M. Tarbé, seated in an armchair, was still holding the basin in his clenched fist. His eyes were closed, and he was moaning piteously, but was quite unconscious. In spite of incessant efforts to restore animation she died at noon.

The doctors certify that in both cases death was due to natural causes. The lady suffered from heart disease, and her husband died of apoplexy, caused by sorrow at seeing her slowly dying.

Edmond Joseph Louis Tarbé des Sablons was born in Paris in 1838. At one time he was music critic of Le Figaro. In 1868 he founded Le Gaulois with Henri de Pene and sold out his interest in it to Arthur Meyer in 1879. His novels include "Les Drames Parisiens," "Monsieur de Morat," "Barbe Grise," &c. He was also the author of "Le Martyr," a play written in collaboration with M. d'Ennery, rehearsals for the revival of which he had been superintending during the last few days at the Comedie Populaire Theatre.

GEORGE A. FULLER DEAD.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 14.—A dispatch from New York announces that George A. Fuller, President of the George A. Fuller Company, died in that city early this morning.

Through the efforts of Mr. Fuller the West saw the possibilities of high office buildings, and set about to have them. No other firm in the world, perhaps, has played so large a part in revolutionizing the building trade as the George A. Fuller Company, and to it primarily is due the credit of having originated many of the actual construction methods now in use. Twenty-eight of Chicago's largest buildings were erected by the firm under Mr. Fuller's personal supervision. Many of the World's Fair structures were built by him. The firm also erected some of the largest structures in New York, Boston, St. Louis, and Pittsburg.

George A. Fuller was born in Templeton, Mass., in 1851. He received his education in the common schools of Baldwinsville and Worcester, and entered Andover College at the age of seventeen. After being graduated from there he entered the Boston School of Technology, taking a special course of one year. His first business experience was in the office of his uncle, J. E. Fuller, an architect, of Worcester. A year later he entered the office of Peabody & Stearns, Boston architects, and at the age of twenty-five was made a partner, and took charge of the New York office.

Shot in Actress's Apartment.

Joseph Geller, who says he is employed in a piano factory at Tenth Avenue and Forty-fifth Street, was shot and probably fatally wounded last night while visiting Sadie Dean, described as an actress, in her flat, at 600 Tenth Avenue. The woman, with Mrs. Mary Lee of 2,506 Eighth Avenue, and Mrs. Julia Lang of 218 West One Hundred and Thirty-third Street, were locked up in the West Forty-seventh Street Police Station, after telling conflicting stories of the shooting. Geller was taken to Roosevelt Hospital, where he said he didn't know which one of the women had shot him.

WOMAN HELD FOR FORGERY.

Represented Herself as Heiress to a Mythical Estate.

Margaret M. Heppenheimer, twenty-six years old, wife of George Heppenheimer, a conductor employed by the Manhattan Railroad Company, of 246 West One Hundred and Forty-fourth Street, was held yesterday at the Centre Street Police Court in $2,000 bail for examination on charges involving forgery. The complainants, Frederick B. House and Mosee H. Grossman of the law firm of House, Grossman & Vorhaus, would have consented to the discharge of the prisoner, who confessed that she had forged a document, a check, and a note and signed their names to them. Magistrate Flammer, however, decided on an examination because of the gravity of the accusations. The complainants were moved to clemency by the fact that the woman has three children and is now in delicate health, while they waver between the opinion that her mind is affected, or that she was prompted by some one who had a foolish scheme to make money.

Mrs. Heppenheimer visited the offices of the complainants with a story about a mythical estate from which she and a supposititious mother were to derive $7,000. There were several interviews, and the prisoner at one of them stole a sheet of headed office paper and forged a certificate that the estate about would be settled at the complainants' office Nov. 26 last. The certificate was indorsed, "Amount awarded on the estate of Upton vs. Lonehan, now $25,750." Then she forged a check for $25,184 on the "American Surety and Trust Company" and a note payable in thirty days for $25,750, signed House & Grossman.

With these documents and an innocent neighbor, F. B. Tallman, an undertaker of 169 Edgecombe Avenue, to vouch for her as respectable—he was completely hoodwinked in regard to the "Upton" estate—she talked of buying securities and a home with Charles C. Dickinson of the Metropolitan Land Company and incidentally discussed a loan of $1,000 for emergencies. She went several times to Mr. Dickinson and told him various stories about the "settlement," and he was almost disposed to advance the money.

Mr. House, however, knew of her enterprise on Monday, and on Tuesday made preparations to thwart her.

She also interested a real estate agent of her neighborhood so that he took her to Abraham Gruber of ex-Gov. Black's law firm, to whom she told her story of being kept out of her money. On his advice she hired a safe deposit box at the Hamilton Bank, in Harlem, to safeguard the certificate, check, and note.

Mrs. Heppenheimer was arrested by Central Office Detective Gargan on Thursday night. Her husband, who was in court yesterday, appeared to be utterly distressed. He said he could not account for his wife's actions, and that her arrest came on him like a thunderclap. The family live poorly, but have been considered honest. It appears, however, that the woman was involved in a doubtful transaction relating to a mortgage of her household furniture in 1898.

THREE BOYS DROWNED.

Were Skating on a Mill Pond at Finesville, N. J.—One Body Recovered.

LAMBERTVILLE, N. J., Dec. 14.—Three boys were drowned in a skating accident at Finesville, some miles above this place, this evening. Two of the boys were sons of William Snyder, one seven years old and the other nine, and the third boy was a son of Elmer Doane, and was ten years old. The drowning occurred in the millpond in the village. They and others were out upon the ice, which had formed during the last few days.

Very few details have been received here as to what occurred, and reports are contradicted. One story is that one of the boys broke through the ice and the other two attempted his rescue and also went down, and another account says that the three were together, and were running across the pond when they came upon a hole and went through together. One body has been recovered.

The news was brought here to-night by a man who was sent down to bring the Coroner to the village in the morning, telegraphic communication with Lambertville being interrupted through the breaking of a wire.

NO FRICTION IN KINGS.

Lieutenant Governor Explains the Reported Split in the Brooklyn Organization.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Lieut. Gov. Woodruff arrived in Washington this afternoon. He has come to attend the dinner which Senator Depew will give to Governor-elect Odell to-morrow night.

Mr. Woodruff says that all is harmonious in the Brooklyn organization, and that all reports of friction are false. The story that he had a split with Michael J. Dady and Walter B. Atterbury arose from a comedy of errors. This is Mr. Woodruff's account of the origin of the mistake:

"Dady went off to Mexico after the campaign and said that if he got his Havana and Mexico contracts he would be too busy to undertake again the duties of Chairman of the County Committee and would not serve again. I got back after he left, and hearing that he had got his contracts, I assumed that he would not accept a re-election. In the meantime Atterbury told me that he would give up the County Chairmanship in favor of an independent Republican, for the sake of the effect on the Mayoralty campaign next year.

"The newspapers then printed stories about how Dady's absence was being taken advantage of to defeat him for re-election and how I was also trying to turn Atterbury down. Atterbury and I went ahead and canvassed the names of the leading Independents, such as James McKeen, Willis L. Ogden, and others, and found that none who were eligible for the place were able to accept it. Atterbury then consented to serve again. Dady, having finished his business in Mexico, came back, and stories were at once printed about how he was 'rushing back' to fight for the Chairmanship. When he got back he came up to my house and said he was willing to serve again, and it was so arranged. The next night the district leaders met at my house and it was all settled, and Atterbury and Dady were unanimously re-elected."

CHARGE AGAINST TWO POLICEMEN

Roundsman and Patrolman Arraigned in Brooklyn for Extortion.

Roundsman Michael J. Lyman and Patrolman William H. Biggs of the Brownsville Police Station were charged with extortion in the Gates Avenue Police Court, Brooklyn, yesterday by Frederick Heinemann, a saloon keeper at East New York Avenue and Sackman Street. Heinemann alleges that the policemen visited his saloon and demanded $50 on threat of placing him under arrest for exposing a slot machine. Heinemann claims that he paid the money to escape arrest.

The saloon keeper afterward went to Police Headquarters in Manhattan and reported the matter. The accused men were suspended pending an investigation of the charges. Heinemann later obtained a warrant for their arrest. Counsel for the policemen in court yesterday entered a plea of not guilty for their clients and the examination of the accused was adjourned for ten days. Bail which they had furnished upon their arrest was continued.

SEVEN WERE KILLED IN NORMAL SCHOOL FIRE

Six of the Victims Girl Students of the Fredonia Institution.

Wire Window Screens Prevented Easy Access to the Fire Escapes—Nothing Saved from the Building.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., Dec. 14.—From the smoldering ruins of the Fredonia State Normal and Training School, which was destroyed by fire at 0 o'clock this morning, one charred body has been recovered, and it is now certain that seven persons perished in the fire.

There were seventy-five young women students in the building, of whom six perished. The other victim was the aged janitor. The dead are:

FIZZELL, MAUD F., Bradford, Penn.
HATHAWAY, BESSIE, Cannonsville, N. Y.
JONES, IRENE, Busti, N. Y.
MORRIS, PHINEAS J., janitor.
STORMS, CORA, Boston, N. Y.
THOMAS, RUTH, Pike, N. Y.
WILLIAMS, MAE, Lake Como, Penn.

The young women occupied rooms on the third floor of the building in company with a matron. Those who succeeded in escaping did so by descending the fire escapes. The body recovered from the ruins is supposed to be that of Miss Storms. It was burned beyond recognition.

To account for the origin of the fire puzzles the local Board of Managers, as there was no furnace in the building, the heat being piped from a boiler two blocks away. The fire started in the private room of Janitor Morris, and was discovered by Charles Gibbs, assistant janitor, who notified Morris and then ran to the fire alarm station a block away. Morris evidently lost his life while fighting the blaze. Miss Fizzell was seen on the fire escape, and turned back into the burning building to save a diamond ring. The others who perished were suffocated, being unable to find the fire escapes.

It is stated that heavy wire screens were firmly nailed across the windows leading to the fire escapes, and the only way those who escaped saved their lives was by crawling through windows adjacent to the escapes and then creeping along the gutter of the mansard roof. Lawyers say there will be damage suits instituted against the State because of the screens.

A search for the bodies is being made as rapidly as possible, but it is slow work digging over the acre of débris, which is still burning. Principal Palmer estimates the property loss at $200,000, with $93,000 insurance.

Nothing was saved from the building, not even the personal effects of the young women or the records of the school. Grief-stricken parents are beginning to arrive.

School has been adjourned until Jan. 3, when classes will meet in the halls and churches of the village. Plans for a new and larger structure are already under way. The Legislature will be asked to make an appropriation.

CHINESE WEDDING FEAST.

Ceremony in Chinatown No Joke for Bride and Bridegroom.

Joss sticks, firecrackers, incense, skyrockets, tom-toms, and blue fire were the prime features in a genuine Chinese wedding which took place at 57 Bayard Street, in the Chinese quarter last night. The contracting parties were Mr. Henry Lum and Miss Di Hai. The bride was brought in a carriage from her home, at 21 Mott Street, completely blindfolded, a loose robe of crimson flowing from the top of her head to her sandaled feet. She is not allowed to see her intended husband until after a three days' term of "probation."

When the bride entered the room where the guests were assembled, an immense bunch of firecrackers was set off by one of the bridegroom's relations. Miss Hai was immediately taken in charge by her "sponsor," Miss Josie Ling, who is responsible for the bride's safekeeping for the next three days. She was then led into a side room, where she was seated, to remain a kind of silent partner to the whole business, while all the family relations made a glorious evening of it—all except the bridegroom. He had to go into another apartment and take off all the gorgeous Oriental wedding toggery which he had worn prior to the entrance of his fiancée. That ended his part in the programme.

These two personages being safely disposed of, the relatives and neighbors plunged into the dissipations of the wedding feast, which lasted until far into the night, while the happy bride and bridegroom, according to custom, languished in two separate rooms with nothing to eat.

WED IN HASTE, WIFE MISSING.

Commercial Man Meets a Young Woman on a Train and Woes Her.

Special to The New York Times.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 14.—Clifton Holmes, a commercial traveler, met a young woman on a New York Central train as it was coming out of Rochester. They fell in love with each other, though neither had ever seen the other before, and they got married at Auburn.

When Holmes entered the train he noticed a lady seated by herself. She appeared homesick and had evidently been crying. He became interested and succeeded in learning her name, Estella Cutter, her home was in Chicago, but all her relatives were dead, and she was coming East to friends. Their interest in each other grew rapidly and when Auburn was reached they left the train, went to a minister's house, and were married.

They then returned to the station to take a train to Owego, but while he was looking after the baggage, she disappeared and no trace of her has yet been found.

Miners Strike at Blossburg, Ala.

Special to The New York Times.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Dec. 14.—Three hundred miners in the employ of the Sloss-Sheffield Steel and Iron Company at Blossburg have quit work pending an investigation by the Executive Board of the district into their grievance. Their complaint is that two negroes who have worked against the order to which the white mine workers belong, namely, the United Mine Workers of America, are employed at Blossburg and use their positions there to exert influence against the mine workers' organization. The mine workers have demanded the discharge of the negroes, but the company has refused to grant the request. The question raised is one of importance, as it involves the question of union men working in the same mine with non-union men.

THE DURYEA WILL CONTEST.

Witnesses Testify to the Starchmaker's Alleged Dissolute Habits.

Special to The New York Times.

MINEOLA, L. I., Dec. 14.—The hearing in the contest over the will of Edgar E. Duryea, the Glen Cove starch manufacturer, was continued here to-day before Surrogate Seabury.

The first witness called was Matthias M. Dodd of Seacliff. He said that on his way to and from his place of business he had seen Mr. Duryea frequently in the Glen Cove train during 1897, 1898, and 1899, and on almost every one of these occasions the latter seemed to be under the influence of liquor.

Max Hart, a New York real estate dealer, testified that he first met Duryea in a saloon at Fourteenth Street and Irving Place, Manhattan, where the starchmaker entered with four men and invited everybody in the place to "line up" at the bar. Everybody accepted the invitation, and had several drinks, when Duryea failed to find any money in his pockets. He drew out his check book, and, the witness believes, drew a check for $600. Witness said Duryea acted like an insane man, constantly boasting of his immense wealth.

Mrs. Annie Somersby, for six years a servant in the Duryea family, testified that she had once remonstrated with young Walter Duryea upon the dissolute habits of himself and father, whereupon the young man had discharged her on the spot.

Jacob E. Person, the family coachman, testified that the elder Duryea was nearly always drunk when he came home from New York.

Lizzie Deveny said that while she was employed as waitress in Dr. Hill's place, on Fifth Avenue, Mr. Duryea was there. She said he usually slept in an armchair, and always kept a bottle of whisky on the table. The witness said she had heard a conversation between Duryea and his son Walter in which Walter asked his father to put his sisters out of the house. The father said he would do so, as they annoyed him.

Charles R. Seabright, formerly a brakeman on the Oyster Bay branch of the Long Island Railroad, said he had often seen Duryea on his train, and had rarely seen him sober. On one occasion Duryea had almost succeeded in disrobing himself in the car before he could be restrained.

Several other trainmen, coachmen, house servants, and casual acquaintances added their testimony as to Mr. Duryea's alleged dissolute habits, after which the hearing was adjourned to Tuesday morning next.

MISSISSIPPI BOAT LOST.

Vessel Carrying Many Passengers Strikes a Snag Near New Orleans—All Saved.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, La., Dec. 14.—The Mississippi River steamboat Warren, loaded with a Christmas cargo for the plantations, was sunk last night by running into a hidden snag in the river twelve miles above the city, and is a total loss.

This was the chief trip of the season for the Warren, and there were on board a large number of passengers, planters, and their wives and children who had come to the city to buy Christmas presents.

The steamboat sank rapidly in the deep water near the landing. All the passengers were saved by being landed in small skiffs, although there were many narrow escapes. Soon after the last boatload had landed the steamboat's smoke stacks disappeared from view.

The passengers and crew spent the night on the narrow levee in the Willows and built fires to protect them from the cold until assistance came from the city.

FUTURE TRADE WITH CANADA.

Comment of Montreal Star on Editorial Article in The New York Times.

Special to The New York Times.

MONTREAL, Quebec, Dec. 14.—The papers here reproduce the editorial article in THE NEW YORK TIMES of Dec. 12 on "Future Trade with Canada," and comment upon it. The Montreal Daily Star says:

"If there ever should be any improved trade relations between the two countries, it will be for business and not sentimental reasons. The Anglo-Saxon unity idea will never make the neighboring Republic forego one jot or tittle of what it considers its interests for the sake of reciprocity. We hope to see Canada act on similar business principles in a business manner. In many lines of commerce reciprocity might be had with advantage to both.

"While for years we offered our neighbors reciprocity in a generous list of articles, conditions are changing, and in many instances it would be more to the lasting advantage of Canada to work up her raw products at home. This may make us competitors with the United States, but we cannot afford to be mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to any country. In a word, though improved trade relations are always desirable between two adjacent countries, reciprocity is not nearly of as great importance to Canada as was once thought."

SENATE VOTES FOR AN AMERICAN CANAL

Two More Amendments to Hay-Pauncefote Agreement.

ONE ABROGATES OLD TREATY

Other Strikes Out Invitation to Powers to Participate.

Senator Lodge Fails to Get a Date Set for a Final Vote—Secretary Hay to Remain in Cabinet.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—The Senate has about won its fight for a strictly American declaration touching the canal across Nicaragua. When it finished its labors in executive session to-day every word that could be eliminated from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty so as to manifest a determination to act with entire independence of any other nation had been stricken out. The convention under discussion still remains the Hay-Paucefote treaty in name, but it is admitted to-night by some of the Senators who voted for the successive amendments that it no longer can be regarded as carrying out the objects sought to be reached by the treaty negotiated by Secretary Hay and Ambassador Pauncefote.

"The treaty will be ratified," said a Senator to-night who had voted for all the amendments. "Whether there will be an exchange of ratifications after Great Britain has looked at the changes we have made, is another thing. I would not say that that expectation is entertained by a majority of the Senate. The discussion has led a majority of Senators to decide that if the United States is to build a canal across the Isthmus it must be without the consent of any other nations than Nicaragua and Costa Rica. So, having decided to protect the canal after it has been built, we have further concluded to take care of it without the consent or assistance of the powers."

Another report which, in the nature of things, cannot be verified without getting at the secrets of the managers alleged to have the matter in charge, is that the passage of an American declaration touching the Nicaraguan Canal, the enactment of the Ship Subsidy bill, the completion of the Canal bill, and the approval of an appportionment measure, will all hang together at this session and all go through the struggle with pretty solid Republican support. The Subsidy bill, it is mentioned in its report, is to get about the vote that is given to the Canal bill, and the amended treaty was to have all the votes of both.

the canal independently of all treaties either in force or pending.

Senator Spooner (Rep., Wis.) combated the arguments of Mr. Culberson. He said that he favored the canal and believed the United States should have the right to fortify and defend it, but could not accept the view that we should proceed in that great work in total disregard of the existence of the old agreement. Great Britain, he said, is a friendly power, and he would not consent to any ruthless proceedings, but would go at the work of preparing for the construction in an orderly way which would insure the support and good will of a kindred people. He therefore was an advocate of the pending negotiation.

He said that Great Britain on three different occasions had approached this country to secure the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but on each occasion the United States had declined the overtures. Therefore the proposition had been acted upon by the State Department without consulting Congress, but at any rate the incidents at least indicated the English attitude upon the question of abrogation.

Senator Lindsay (Dem., Ky.) spoke for the ratification of the treaty without further amendment. He said that he had even opposed the committee's amendment adopted yesterday, because, to his mind, the amendment is a concession to Great Britain which it is unnecessary to make. "It concedes," he said, "that without the amendment Great Britain would have the right to pass ships through the canal in time of war, and I am not willing to have the United States take that position. I think the treaty would have been stronger without the amendment." Mr. Lindsay also announced his willingness to treat with Great Britain for the total abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Senator McCumber (Rep., N. D.,) also favored ratification of the treaty without amendment.

Senator Elkins (Rep., West Va.,) repeated the views expressed by him yesterday for absolutely independent action in the construction of the canal, and in the operations of the United States in Central America. He said he had received many telegrams indorsing his position.

MR. HAY WILL NOT RESIGN.

Little Doubt that the President Will Refer the Amended Treaty to Great Britain for Action.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Since the action of the Senate to-day there have been all sorts of rumors about what is to happen to the treaty and to Secretary Hay. An earlier report was that the President intended to ask the Senate to return to him the mangled remnants of the Hay-Pauncefote instrument, so that short work could be made of it by dropping the effort to ratify it. Another report was that Secretary Hay, vexed beyond measure by the disregard shown for the President and himself in the mutilation of the treaty, would resign, and had, in fact, tendered his resignation.

Several Senators said to-night that they heard no suggestions in the Senate to-day that the President would withdraw the treaty. The President has conferred with the leading Republicans to-day and knows that the sentiment of the body is against the original treaty, and in favor of the association of the views expressed in the different amendments adopted. As the President has assumed the responsibility for Mr. Hay's work, and had asked the Congress to approve it, if there is any disrespect in the treatment of the Secretary of State it has all been addressed directly to his Chief.

As to the reported intention of Secretary Hay to resign, a high officer of the Department of State said that Mr. Hay had discounted the action of the Senate several days ago, and had denied the report that he intended to resign. He had expected that the Senate would amend the treaty, although he still considered the instrument offered better on most accounts than the one that the Senate intends to evolve. But he then declared, as he explained to-day, that he had not threatened to resign, and did not intend to express his disappointment by that action.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST MR. HAY.

A Senator who disagrees with Secretary Hay in his opinion about the treaty, but who does not share the feeling he discovers in the Senate, says that undoubtedly there is Senate pressure to make the most of the action of the Senate on the treaty to bring about Mr. Hay's resignation. In some of the Republican papers, West as well as East, there has been a great deal of persistent criticism of Mr. Hay. Right in the campaign he was assailed as having given away American rights in Alaska because he had assented to the temporary delimitation of the border between territory of the United States and Great Britain in carrying out a modus vivendi.

He has also been criticised for entering into reciprocity treaties, all of which the Senate has hung up, and there has been no let-up in the war upon him on account of the canal treaty since it was published. References to him have been made in the executive sessions impeaching his Americanism, and as all Secretaries of State hear of the talk in executive sessions in different ways, it is probable that Mr. Hay has received the very worst reports about himself.

"I do not believe Secretary Hay will resign," said a Republican Senator to-night. "Undoubtedly this resignation is desired by those who are responsible for the report. I do not believe there is a word of truth in it."

Secretary Hay has just extended invitations to his Cabinet associates to an entertainment in their honor in Easter week. This circumstance is pointed out as indicating his intention to remain in the Cabinet.

Several of Mr. Hay's fellow-Cabinet officers declared that nothing whatever was said at the Cabinet meeting to-day on this subject, and said even the treaty proceedings in the Senate were not discussed.

TO SEND TREATY TO ENGLAND.

Unless amended beyond any degree proposed in the Senate by the responsible leaders, and resolved into such form as to make it a discourteous matter to communicate it, the pending Hay-Pauncefote treaty will be submitted to the British Government by the President. The communication will be purely pro forma, for the Administration has not the slightest idea that the convention will be accepted by the British Government. If this belief is well founded, then the document will go into the limbo of treaties failed of ratification, its position comparing in some degree with the Olney-Pauncefote arbitration treaty.

The President might, if he regards the amendments made by the Senate to the treaty as objectionable, take upon himself the responsibility of administering the final stroke by simply withholding it from the British Government. There is precedent for such action in the disposal made of certain treaties by President Cleveland. But in that case the objection was all on the American side, while in the present it is assumed that Great Britain may be the party to whom the amendments are most obnoxious, and so might properly be accorded the privilege of passing upon them finally. That is the Administration view of the situation.

COMMENT BY BRITISH PRESS.

London Times Says It Would Be a Meaningless Formality to Present the Mutilated Treaty.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The morning papers generally comment on the adoption of the Davis amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Times, which regards the matter as a "check to President McKinley," suggests that "the new Senate, meeting in March, may not consider itself bound by the present vote," and says:

"In any case our course is perfectly clear. Mr. McKinley is well aware that it would be a superfluous and meaningless formality to present the mutilated Hay-Pauncefote treaty to her Majesty's Government. The proposal to give the United States military authority over the canal is analogous to that technicality reserved for Turkey under the Suez convention. It ignores such vital distinctions as that Egypt is a vassal of Turkey, and that the exercise of the authority in question requires to be sanctioned by the protecting powers under the Treaty of London.

"England has made a frank and liberal offer in the hope of removing any possible cause of discord, and, despite the action of the United States Senate, we believe the course of Great Britain is appreciated by the people of the United States. If concessions are refused, we can only express our regret. Our existing treaty rights remain untouched."

"No other construction can be placed upon the action of the United States Senate," says The Daily Chronicle, "than that Senators have deliberately made up their minds to force England into a false position and to make the refusal to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaty come from this side. President McKinley, as usual, shouts with the larger crowd.

"If the United States go out of the way to break treaty engagements, such conduct will come within the definition of an 'unfriendly act.' We are loath to think that the era of good relations with America is coming to an end, but if she were to take advantage of our complications in South Africa and China, after we had given our aid during her complications with Spain, we could neither desire nor trust her friendship in the future."

The Daily Chronicle publishes an article from a correspondent who contends that it would be rather to British interests than otherwise for the canal to be fortified. He says:

"Forts cannot protect a canal if an enemy operating against them has command of the sea, because the blockading squadron, beyond the range of the forts, can completely block the canal as a highway. It is difficult to understand why Great Britain objects and why the Americans desire to fortify, and it is rather unfortunate that the matter should have become one of principle.

"Germany, Japan, and Russia all have more cogent reasons to wish the canal unprotected than we have, because, if unfortified, it could more easily be seized to our detriment."

The Daily Telegraph says: "Nothing could be more unfortunate. The temper of the Senate is clear and unmistakable. It is quite possible that the result will be to postpone the construction of the canal for years. Great Britain has clearly defined rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

"At the same time it needs scarcely be said that her Majesty's Government will not display any dog-in-the-manger temper toward the United States. Proof of this had already been given, and will certainly be forthcoming again when the British Foreign Office is approached with respect to the Senate's amendment through the usual diplomatic channels."

The Daily News, which argues that the question is one primarily for the American people themselves, says the amendment denotes hostility to the canal quite as much as to England.

INQUIRY IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

LONDON, Dec. 14.—In the House of Commons to-day the attempt of Henry Norman, Liberal, member for South Wolverhampton, to draw the Government on the subject of the Nicaragua Canal, failed, Lord Cranborne, Parliamentary Secretary for the Foreign Office, contenting himself with replying to the effect that no communication had passed between Great Britain and the other European Governments with the view of eliciting whether they were to regard as neutral a canal occupied and fortified by the United States.

No useful purpose, Lord Cranborne added, could be served at the present moment by replying to the other paragraphs of the question of Mr. Norman. These asked if Nicaragua accepted the United States Senate's committee view that the relationship of the United States and Nicaragua was analogous to that of Turkey and Egypt at the time of the construction of the Suez Canal, namely, the relationship of suzerain and vassal, and if the United States associated itself with the protocol signed at the London conference of March 13, 1871, to the effect that no power could liberate itself from the engagements of a treaty without the assent of the contracting parties.

ATTITUDE OF FRANCE.

PARIS, Dec. 14.—The French Government will not offer objection to any action of the United States Congress regarding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. They prefer that the Nicaragua Canal should be neutral, but they appreciate the United States' strategic reasons for fortifying the canal, and France's interests are too small to induce the Government to interfere in any way in the matter.

It is thought, however, that while it is natural the United States should close the canal in case of war in which she herself is concerned, the canal might reasonably be expected to be left open in the event of a war between other powers. This, however, is only an expression of opinion.

SENATOR DAVIS'S IDEA.

He Explained the Meaning of His Amendment in a Private Letter.

CHICAGO, Dec. 14.—In regard to the meaning and justification of the so-called Davis amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, H. H. Kohlsaat, editor of The Times-Herald, to-day makes public a private letter he received from the late Senator C. K. Davis. The letter bears date, "Committee of Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Washington, D. C., March 12, 1900," and is in part as follows:

The amendment has this special advantage, that it was phrased as nearly as possible in the language of the Tenth Article of Treaty of Constantinople. Therefore, this amendment, so adjusted to the treaty of Constantinople, puts the British Government in the position where it must either accept the principle of the treaty of Constantinople, which Great Britain herself proposed, or flatly say that the lines of that treaty which are of advantage to Great Britain shall stand in our treaty, and that the lines of that treaty which are to our advantage, and may be disadvantageous to Great Britain, shall be obliterated from our treaty.

If the committee had framed their amendment on different lines, or in different terms, Great Britain could have said that we had departed from the treaty of Constantinople and introduced new principles. She would not have been correct in saying so, but she would have said it. My own object was to hold her as closely as possible to her own precedent.

The possessions of the United States, as to Texas, are less distant, and as to California, not much further distant from the ports of access of the Nicaragua Canal than are the possessions of Turkey at the lower end of the Red Sea from the port of egress from the Suez Canal. The idea that the two situations are not identical in principle, so far as the necessity of defense is concerned, is simply preposterous.

Article 10 of the treaty of Constantinople binds the parties to ask other States which have not signed it to accede to it. This the United States could not do, because to do so would be a violation of its policy as to European complications, steadily adhered to since Washington's farewell address. Article 8 and possibly some other articles in the treaty of Constantinople bind the signatory powers to watch over the execution of the treaty.

To do this would bring the United States within the concert of Europe as an active participating and possibly belligerent power. That which we cannot do as to Europe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty invites the European powers to do as to the Western Hemisphere. Introducing them as parties in control under certain contingencies, and all in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

GOMEZ THREATENS AMERICA?

Declares Only Practical Way to Drive United States from Cuba Is to Fight.

HAVANA, Dec. 14.—It is reported that Gen. Maximo Gomez and Señor Juan Gualberto Gomez have declared that the only practical way to drive the Americans from Cuba is to fight. These two men, who for a long time were bitterly hostile, are now friends, and Gen. Gomez declares that he is entirely with his old enemy in sentiment as to the future of Cuba.

Predictions are freely made, especially among the Conservatives, that the Cuban Constitutional Convention will break up in a wrangle over the question of suffrage, the issue between universal and restricted suffrage being sharply drawn. The eastern delegates and the radicals from the western part of the island advocate giving the blacks the right to vote.

The convention committees are also wrangling as to the Presidential qualifications and as to the form of government, some advocating the Federal system and others the unitary, or centralized, system.

WILLIAMS ALUMNI DINE

College Education and City Reform Discussed Post Prandially.

Quaint Contract Read Showing What Was Once Expected of a Professor of Languages.

Love of Alma Mater was the dominating spirit that last night drew about the banqueting board in Delmonico's several hundred of the loyal sons of old Williams, the occasion being the annual dinner of the Williams College Alumni Association of New York.

Jacob F. Miller, President of the association, presided, and with him at table were President Franklin Carter of the college, Prof. William M. Sloane of Columbia and Princeton, Robert Bridges of Princeton, the Rev. Dr. Henry P. Dewey, Francis Lynde Stetson, Bainbridge Colby, Ralph Marsh, Henry Loomis Nelson, J. Edward Simmons, Eugene Delano, Hamilton W. Mabie, Justice Rumsey, Augustus C. Brown, Stephen H. Tyng, the Rev. A. F. Schauffler, Melvin Eggleston, Wilhelmus Mynderse, Dr. Vanderpoel Adriance, Charles Bulkley Hubbell, Surrogate George B. Abbott, Frederick B. Jennings, and Henry Burden.

Mr. Miller, in an introductory address, defended a college education along general lines. He said that the cry now was, "What is the use of going to college?" It had been maintained that the chief characteristic of the coming century was specialization. Many of the colleges had gone off with that idea and so lost track of the great uses and advantages of a college. Because this was a practical age, he was in favor of the old-fashioned way of educating men not to do anything in particular, but that they might be in a position to do anything they were called on to do.

President Carter next sketched the history of the college, pointing out that she led in the expansive history of the last century, and was the first in the list of colleges to engage a professor of French in the day when French was counted in the list with dancing and hair dressing. Williams's professor of French, said Mr. Carter, taught only French, and in contrast to this he read the following contract which he said he had obtained under great difficulties. Dartmouth being the second college to have a professor of French, but not, as in the case of Williams, of French alone:

An agreement between the Rev. Dr. Eleazar Wheelock, President of Dartmouth College, and Mr. John Smith, late tutor of the same, with respect to said Mr. Smith's settlement and salary in capacity of Professor of the Languages in Dartmouth College.

Mr. Smith agrees to settle as Professor of English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, &c., in Dartmouth College, to teach which, and as many of these and other such languages as he shall understand, as the Trustees shall judge necessary and practicable for one man, and also to read lectures on them as often as the President, Trustees, &c., with himself shall judge profitable for the seminary. He also agrees, while he can do it consistently with his office as professor, annually to serve as tutor to a class of students in the college.

In consideration of which, Dr. Wheelock agrees to give him (the said Mr. Smith) £100 lawful money annually as a salary, to be paid one-half in money and the other half in money or in such necessary articles for a family as wheat, Indian corn, rye, beef, pork, mutton, butter, cheese, hay, pasturing, &c., as long as he shall continue Professor as aforesaid, and that he shall have these articles delivered to him at the same price for which they were usually sold before the commencement of the present war in America; namely, that he shall have wheat at 5s. per bushel, rye at 3s., Indian corn at 2s. 6d., fresh beef at 3d. per pound, salt beef at 2½d., fresh pork at 4½d., salt pork at 7d., fresh beef at 18s. per hundredweight, fresh pork at 25s., mutton at 3d. per pound, butter at 9d., cheese at 3d., bread at 2d., hay at 30s. per ton, pasturing for horse 30s., for cow 20s., and also to give him one acre of land near the college for a building spot, a deed of which he promises to give him whenever he shall request the same.

Prof. William M. Sloane of Columbia, who made the next address, in speaking of the city reform movement, said that the University Settlement idea had not obtained as firm a hold as it should have obtained. "What we need," he said, "is not the whip of scorpions, but the friendly hand. What prevents our working side by side is ignorance the one of the other. The laborer who works with his hand and the one who works with his mind should understand each other."

Prof. Sloane said that the first step necessary in the general reformation was a change in the police force. Until that was regenerated, he said, there could be no forward movement of any account. If there was a unity of purpose and of ideas the college-bred men could, if they stood together, be a force for good that could not be combated.

Addresses were also made by Robert Bridges and the Rev. Dr. Henry P. Dewey.

PRINTERS VERSUS MACHINISTS.

Federation of Labor Committee Against Interference in the Dispute.

LOUISVILLE, Dec. 14.—The Committee on Resolutions of the American Federation of Labor reported to-day with reference to the dispute between the International Association of Machinists and the International Typographical Union as to trade autonomy. The committee recommended that the Federation of Labor refuse to interfere.

This precipitated a polemic battle between President O'Connell of the machinists, who opposed the committee's recommendation, and President Lynch of the typographical union, who supported it.

Mr. O'Connell protested against any proposition to force the machinists to join the International Typographical Union. "We maintain," he said, "that a man who takes care of a linotype machine mechanically is properly a member of the machinists' craft, and should belong to the International Association of Machinists."

Mr. Lynch argued in favor of only one union of workers in printing offices in order that the rights of the employes might be more advantageously maintained. "On the industrial field," he said, "we want to meet the employers as one organization. But any skilled machinist can be admitted to the International Typographical Union if he so desires. We have assumed and successfully maintained this jurisdiction and we are able to maintain it to the advantage of all who work in newspaper offices—a thing which the International Association of Machinists has not been able to do for its men employed in printing offices."

After a hard fight on the floor, a compromise was finally adopted, expressing regret at the alleged disposition of the Typographical Union to refuse arbitration, but still refusing to commit the Federation to interference in the strife between the two unions.

FIGHT OVER BRUSH WILL

BOLDLY CLAIMS DIVINE POWER

Miss Brush Died Because She Did Not Understand the Faith, Mrs. Holden Declares.

The second day's hearing of the contest over the will of Helen C. Brush before Surrogate Fitzgerald attracted a large audience. Christian Science plays a part in the contest and many members of the First Church of Christ, Scientists, which will benefit to the extent of $50,000 if the will is sustained, were present. The will was drawn up by Lawyer George W. De Lano, a trustee of the church.

James E. Brush, a brother of the testatrix, who receives only $1,000 under the will, is the contestant. His charge is that his sister was mentally unbalanced, and, further, that members of the First Church of Christ exerted undue influence.

The hearing developed the fact that Christian Scientists never tell their age. When Mrs. Anna Holden, a "healer," and witness of the will, was asked how old she was at the first hearing, she answered: "Over thirty." When Mr. De Lano was asked his age yesterday, he hesitated, and finally replied: "I will say as Christ said: 'Before Abraham was, I am.'"

Mrs. Holden was cross-examined again as to the doctrines taught by Christian Scientists and how much influence these doctrines had on Miss Brush. The witness repeated her testimony that Miss Brush's death was caused by consumption July 7 last.

"Was Miss Brush a 'healer'?"

"I do not know whether she took patients or not, but she was qualified to do so," replied the witness.

"Was Miss Brush attended during her last illness by an ordinary physician?"

"She was not. She was a true believer."

"Don't Scientists die?"

"They do."

"What is the first question asked a person who is ill and wants the Christian Science treatment?"

"Have you dismissed your physician?"

"Can cancer, smallpox, and consumption be cured by Christian Science?"

"They can."

"They can."

"How about surgical operations?"

"There are healers who do perform surgical operations."

The witness said she believed in Mrs. Eddy's book, "Science and Health," and Mr. Bower then read to her a number of extracts, giving accounts of alleged cures performed by Mrs. Eddy. One case was that of a Cincinnati man who had the bone of his foot crushed by a heavy timber. He wrote to Mrs. Eddy and immediately thereafter the injured bone began to heal. Mrs. Eddy claimed the credit for this cure.

"Do you believe that?" asked Mr. Bowers.

"I do."

"Did Miss Brush believe it also?"

"Yes."

"Do you believe that scientists have the power to cure consumption?"

"I do."

"How did Christian Science happen to fail in Miss Brush's case?"

"Because both the healer and Miss Brush did not thoroughly understand the principles of Christian Science."

Mrs. Holden was then questioned more closely about the will. It was developed that Miss Brush lived with a Miss Duncan, a healer, in Central Park West, and that Mrs. Stetson, reader of the church, and Mrs. Holden often called there. There were two wills executed, one on May 22 and the other on May 24. The first will was destroyed when the second was executed. Mr. De Lano met Mrs. Holden at the First Church on the day the first will was executed, and the two went to Miss Brush's apartments.

As to her own experience with Christian Science, Mrs. Holden said that she was suffering from consumption and asthma, and she was induced to become interested in Christian Science. As a result she declared she had been restored to perfect health.

"Christian Scientists don't claim the power to raise the dead, do they?" was asked.

"We have not done it yet. I have not done it," replied the witness.

Mrs. Holden became dramatic as she defended Christian Science. In reply to a question, she said that if the believer in its tenets lived a proper life all that Christ did on earth was within the "healer's" power.

Mr. De Lano, describing the drawing of the will of May 22, said that on the morning of that day Mrs. Stetson came to his office and said that Miss Brush wanted to execute a will. The witness drew up the will at about 11 o'clock that morning from memoranda which Mrs. Stetson gave him. In the afternoon he went to see Miss Brush with Mrs. Holden. Miss Brush read the will and signed it; then he and Mrs. Holden witnessed it.

At this point the hearing was suspended until Monday morning at 10:45 o'clock.

PAULINE FESTE'S SUICIDE.

Attributed to Financial Losses and Failure to Get Theatrical Engagement.

Loss of money in stock speculations followed by failure to secure theatrical employment, it is now believed by her attorney and her former landlady, caused Pauline Feste to put a bullet in her heart while kneeling beside her bed in the Grand Union Hotel Wednesday.

That Pauline Feste and a young woman who occupied the parlor and bedroom of Mrs. Churchill, janitress of 240 East Eighty-fourth Street, for three weeks, until Tuesday evening, are one and the same person, is confidently asserted by the latter, who has recognized the description of the dead girl and her effects as those of her former lodger. The young woman, says Mrs. Churchill, often spoke of having lost money by speculation. W. Henry Gardiner, an attorney of 222 East Eighty-fourth Street, who drew up for Miss Feste the assignment of the $1,500 insurance policy to her sister, Mrs. Augusta Pollock of Paris, said last night that Miss Feste, judging from her conversation, was evidently an actress and had lost much money in Wall Street.

Miss Feste's description tallies with that of a young woman who has of late been much seen around the theatres of Upper Broadway, endeavoring to obtain interviews with the managers.

The so-called will found in her hand bag, Coroner Zucca said last night, was merely a hasty scrawl of her last wishes. She wished her body cremated, it read, the proceeds to be paid out of the policy. The letter to Ernest Feste of New Orleans read in part: "Don't tell mother that I killed myself. If she should ask you, tell her I took a sudden cold and died of it."

BILLIARDS BY AMATEURS

Kellogg and Hendrick the Winners in Yesterday's Games.

A. A. U. CLASS B TOURNAMENT

First Honors Will Be Fought Out Between Cutler, Kellogg, and Hendrick in To-day's Matches.

W. W. Kellogg of Chicago and John A. Hendrick of this city were the winners of the two games played yesterday in the National Class B billiard tournament now in progress at the Knickerbocker Athletic Club. Neither game developed great interest on the part of the spectators. The afternoon match, in which Mr. Kellogg met Frank Billiter, the Minneapolis champion, was the longest of the finale series, occupying three hours and running 73 innings. Better billiards were played in the evening game, but even then neither contestant did his best.

The evening game brought together Mr. Hendrick and Charles G. Schmitt, the Chicago Athletic Association champion. Mr. Hendrick had been picked as the winner, and he did win handily. A run of 32 points in the sixteenth inning, followed by a string of 22 more when he next came to the table, put him 17 points in the lead of his opponent, an advantage which he gradually increased to the end of the game. The game last night was Mr. Schmitt's last one in the tournament, also one of his hardest. Again his dead ball tactics and clever spread draws won him applause. The game was run out by Mr. Hendrick in the fifty-seventh inning. Mr. Schmitt was left at 253 points. The scores:

Hendrick—1 7 11 2 1 2 3 2 0 3 2 0 5 5 8 2 33 2 2 0 2 5 7 2 8 1 0 5 3 0 22 2 1 2 0 7 5 4 0 1 1 0 2 0 1 7 19 18 0 2 1 6 5 2. Total, 300; average, 5 15-57; high runs, 33, 32, 23, and 22.

Schmitt—0 0 0 2 5 8 17 10 10 0 5 28 20 6 0 0 15 1 0 0 0 4 6 10 1 0 4 2 2 0 1 0 15 2 5 1 1 2 3 12 2 1 0 5 3 8 0 10 3 3 0 0 2 2 0 3. Total, 253; average, 4 29-55; high runs, 28 and 20.

Mr. Kellogg played with poor judgment during the first half of the afternoon game, and the Minneapolis man led by a small margin until the 200-mark had been turned. The length of the game tired the patience of the players as well as spectators, and even the loser seemed relieved when it was brought to an end. Mr. Billiter's last game. He lost all five of his matches, and thereby takes last place in the tourney. The scores:

Kellogg—1 0 0 0 5 0 0 3 0 10 1 0 0 4 1 0 0 12 16 19 1 1 0 0 5 2 2 0 0 0 0 0 4 0 1 15 3 5 6 0 29 0 1 5 2 0 8 0 26 1 0 0 0 1 19 1 2 0 1 4 3 19 4 1 6 0 1 2 0 1 3 1 0 0 1 2 0 5 12 0 8 1 3. Total, 300; average, 21 3-5; high runs, 29 and 25.

Billiter—1 2 1 0 0 0 22 3 0 0 0 4 2 0 10 2 0 15 0 15 4 2 0 2 8 0 5 12 1 0 0 3 3 0 1 4 0 0 0 4 18 0 0 14 4 3 1 0 0 12 0 0 7 1 0 0 0 0 16 3 1 4 6 0 6 0 0 9 1 0 4 13 3 0 7 0 0 0 9 0 0 12 0. Total, 284; average, 3 38-82; high run, 22.

Player.	Won.	Lost.	High Run.	High Single Av'g.	Grand Av'g.
A. G. Cutler	3	0	46	9 21-31	...
W. W. Kellogg	3	0	41	5 30-54	...
J. A. Hendrick	3	0	48	6 30-45	...
C. G. Schmitt	2	1	30	5 45-51	4.56
William Paige	1	4	38	5 30-54	4.39
Frank Billiter	0	5	47	....	4.39

A. G. Cutler of Boston will meet John A. Hendrick of this city at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and W. W. Kellogg of Chicago will meet the loser of the afternoon game at 8:30 to-night. The final game of the tourney, unless there is a tie, will be played Monday night.

CYCLISTS' WEARY RIDE.

Six-Day Racers in Good Physical Condition, but Slow Pace Characterizes the Race. The Score at 2 A. M.

	Miles.	Laps.
Pierce and McEachern	2,299	5
Elkes and McFarland	2,299	5
Simar and Gougoltz	2,299	4
Kaser and Ryser	2,299	1
Fischer and Fredericks	2,299	0
Stinson and Waller	2,297	9
Babcock and Aronson	1,506	1
Turville and Gimm	1,499	7

Old record, 2,354 miles 9 laps.

Every new arrival at the six-day bicycle race in the Madison Square Garden last night looked at the riders curiously, as though half expecting to find another vacancy in the little procession of whirling wheels, or else to detect evidences of physical weakness. The question that was uppermost during the day was, "Will the men hold out?"

Dr. T. F. De Naouley, the physician who examines the men twice every day, said yesterday that every man on the track now was in good trim for a strong finish.

"The temperature and respiration of all the men are normal," he continued, "the former running from 98.4 to 99 degrees, while the pulse is from 66 to 84, the latter figure being reached when a man comes in from a lively spurt. It is rational to suppose that after such an ordeal, with irregular meals, loss of sleep and rest, the men would now be badly broken down, but, on the contrary, the physical condition of some of them is better than at the start."

It was clear to even the most impartial observer that sensational spurts were frowned upon. Several efforts of Gougoltz and Simar to recover their lost lap were effectually nipped in the bud.

The interesting little German, Kaser, was the star performer of the day, and he made the arches ring early in the morning and during the afternoon. Entirely unaided by his partner, Ryser, he gained two laps, riding each time as though he were as fresh as a daisy. These gains advanced the German team to fourth place, being two laps ahead of Fischer and Frederick last night, while Waller's desultory riding put his team half a dozen laps further in the rear.

Waller has done some of the queerest things in the race, and continued his antics yesterday, dressing in a business suit in the morning and walking around the ring for half an hour puffing a big cigar. Waller's training consists in doing about as he pleases, and he drinks whisky and Bass's ale. Several of the racers drink a bottle or two of ale a day, but milk, kumyss, and beef extract drinks are the usual beverages.

The special races aroused plenty of enthusiasm, but the long-distance racers often looked behind anxiously when they heard the puffing of "Jimmy" Michael's motor tandem in their rear. Michael made the paced five miles in 9:11 2-5, the last mile being 1:42 4-5. Champion "Major" Taylor broke his own record for an unpaced quarter of a mile, riding it in 0:25 4-5, his former record being 0:26 1-5. "Bobby" Walthour and H. McLean started in a two-mile pursuit race, but it did not last long, for Walthour overhauled his opponent in 3 laps and 20 yards, time 0:43 1-5.

"Johnny" King of Newark and Sam Wheeler of Danbury, Conn., competed in a five-mile pursuit race, but at the end of 1 mile and 6 laps King caught Wheeler; time, 8:45 3-5. Daniel Sullivan of Dwight School and P. G. Van Cott of the Nassau Wheelmen gave an amateur mile exhibition, the best two out of three. Each won a heat and Van Cott took the third mile in 2:28 4-5.

BANK ROBBERS CAPTURED.

WHEELING, West Va., Dec. 14.—The gang of desperadoes that robbed Doerschuck's Bank at Snanesville, Ohio, arrived at Bridgeport just before noon, on the Massillon accommodation of the Cleveland, Lorain and Wheeling Road. Two of the gang were captured after a desperate encounter with officers and trainmen. Four others escaped, and a posse is pursuing them.

The gang boarded the train at Holloway. Officer Meister of this place heard they were on the train. He went to Wheeling Creek and entered the cars. He found the leader in the ladies' coach. The desperado drew a big gun and a fight was at once started, which continued until the train reached Bridgeport, when other officers got on. Two of the gang were overpowered, but the others jumped through the windows and made their escape.

During the fight men and women were frantic with fear, and many tried to jump from the windows while the train was in motion to escape the flying bullets. One of the men captured had $360 in cash, mostly bills, with several hundred pennies in a sack which has the name of the bank stamped on it. They had several bottles of nitro-glycerine, dynamite cartridges, fuses, and various burglar tools. The two refuse to talk or even give their names.

HIS BIG "BEAT" GOT HIM INTO TROUBLE

Green Reporter Boasted He Was a "Good Fakir."

Couldn't Fool Doctors, Yellow Paper Abandoned Him, and He Is an Inmate of Bellevue Pavilion.

Thomas J. Munnock of New York and Connecticut, who described himself to the editor of a sensational newspaper the other day as a reporter and a "good fakir," is in the Bellevue Insane Pavilion, rapidly going crazy in devising means to get out. Incidentally, Mr. Munnock is at present a sane man, twenty-three years old, with a predilection for "yellow" stories, but he says he is now in the worst fix he was ever in. To make matters worse, the newspaper in question has abandoned him to his fate, and the doctors in Bellevue are enjoying themselves at the expense of their unwilling prisoner.

Young Mr. Munnock's reportorial experience has heretofore been largely confined to plain and ornamental "rubber-shoe" work on Connecticut local papers, although he says he is a New Yorker by birth. Occasionally he would send "tips" and tales of rural happenings to New York papers, but, becoming ambitious to spread out and to show the New York reporters some new things in their own line, he came back to town as a "free lance."

His adventures began last Monday, when he laid a brilliant scheme for a fine "beat," pictures inbauded, before the Sunday editor of the paper. The scheme, in brief, was to feign insanity at the Hoffman House, and get himself arrested and committed to the Manhattan Hospital for the insane on Ward's Island, "just to show the public," he says he told the Sunday editor, "how a good fakir like myself can fool the insanity experts at Bellevue; and, of course, if I see anything wrong the story will be all the better."

The Sunday editor told him to go ahead, and if he got the story he would be well paid.

Mr. Munnock betook himself to the Hoffman House, and, assuming a wild-eyed appearance, asked in a loud tone for "Mr. Richard Croker," going through a certain form of gymnastics and incoherent speech, which appealed to him as being affected by insane people. The clerk called a policeman and the fakir was haled to the West Thirtieth Street Police Station. His actions there convinced the Sergeant that he had a case for Bellevue and the young man was bundled into an ambulance and carted across town.

The sensational newspaper helped the story along by giving publicity to the Hoffman House episode, and reinforced it by sending a reporter to Charities Commissioner Keller with a story that he, the reporter, had a friend insane at Bellevue, and he would like to have Mr. Keller ask Dr. Allen Fitch to look after him and see that he was duly committed to the island. Mr. Keller was obliging enough to do so, being an old newspaper man himself. But he discovered things later and became, so it is said, "very sore" on the offending paper.

Until Thursday Mr. Munnock, who was then known as James W. McDonald, was "under observation" by Drs. Wildman and Fitch and Dr. J. R. Davis, the head nurse of Ward No. 38. Then, for reasons of their own and with smiles of satisfaction, they had their patient taken before Magistrate Zeller, who committed him for five days for "further observation."

Munnock simulated a form of insanity where the memory is at fault. He at first sat for hours on a bench in the ward, as if in a stupor; gave a few incoherent yells, and then sank back again with a dull, glassy, vacant stare, which, he now says, was "part of his insane repertory."

When examined, Munnock said at first he did not live in New York, but when the doctors said among themselves that they would have to send him away if he did not live in this county, the fakir struggled with his memory and recollected that his home was here. He told a story of being a faro dealer and a "bad man" generally. The doctors became suspicious right away and for four days put him through a course of questioning and "observation," which brought their patient to the verge of nervous prostration. Then, again, the sensational newspaper took no further steps to get him to Ward's Island, and that helped to further upset him. Thursday night the patient confessed the plot, whereat the experts went among themselves and laughed.

Yesterday a pale-looking young man, with hair wildly disordered and a scraggy red beard of a week's growth stood before Drs. Wildman and Davis and many reporters and begged to be released.

"The game's up," he said to Dr. Wildman for the hundredth time. "Youse fellows has got it all, and I want to get out. If I'd got up to Ward's Island I'd a-fooled youse fellows. Say, doctor, won't you telephone the editor and tell him I want to get out?"

"The only way you can get out that I see," said Dr. Wildman slowly, "is for the paper to swear out a habeas corpus. You lied to me. You admit that. Now, how do I know that you are telling the truth? Boy, you may be insane. We must further observe you."

"Say, if I don't get out of here soon I will go crazy," exclaimed Munnock, looking around for a friendly face. "Say, (to the reporters,) won't some of youse fellows go up and see the editor and tell him I'm still here and that the game is up?"

"The editor will know it soon enough," said Dr. Wildman lightly. "You can write if you want. Just as many letters as you see fit."

"Now, Munnock, what was your object?" asked Dr. Wildman for the benefit of the visitors. "What did you expect to find at the Island?"

"I wanted to show," was the reply, "that I could fool youse fellows who call yourselves experts."

Dr. Wildman laughed. "I have had twenty years' experience," said he. "We had you spotted ten minutes after you arrived. You did very well, though, when you sat on the bench for hours as if in a stupor, but you did not act like a stuporous person. You pretended to lose your memory, but an insane person doesn't do it in that way."

Munnock forgot his troubles long enough to laugh at the recollection of sitting on the bench, and remarked that he did that well.

Munnock, while admitting that the food and general arrangements at the Pavilion are excellent, is afraid if he does not get out soon that he will be shipped off to Philadelphia or some other place. Dr. Wildman left him with the hope that habeas corpus proceedings would be duly forthcoming, but he couldn't think of turning him loose otherwise until he had taken a further course of "observation." Munnock's stiff, straight hair stood up stiffer and straighter upon hearing the doctor's dictum, and he remarked pathetically that he is a married man.

At the office of the newspaper an editor said:

"He can stay there until hell freezes over, for all we care. We offered to take his story at space rates if he got it and we could verify it. Munnock is not on our staff."

THE CIVIL SERVICE REFORMERS HONORED

National League Greeted at Dinner by City Association.

BISHOP POTTER AT THE FEAST

Carl Schurz's Health Drunk Standing—Gov. Roosevelt Refers to His Work —Mr. McVeagh's Pleasantries.

Nearly 300 guests attended the dinner tendered in the Hotel Savoy last night to the Civil Service Reform League by the Civil Reform Association of New York. Bishop Potter presided, the retiring President of the league, Mr. Schurz, being absent.

Gov. Roosevelt, arriving two hours after the diners had been seated, talked for almost an hour about civil service reform and kindred subjects. Incidentally, he said that "most of the men on the New York City police force will be glad to do good work if you give them a chance."

Other speakers were Wayne MacVeagh of Pennsylvania, Oscar S. Straus, Charles J. Bonaparte, W. H. Baldwin, Jr., Herbert Welsh of Philadelphia, William Dudley Foulke of Indiana, Civil Service Commissioner Collier, Senator N. A. Elsberg, and Harry Garfield of Ohio, son of the late President of the United States.

Bishop Potter's introductory consisted of a eulogy to Carl Schurz, whom he describes as one of the few men to whom the advance of the civil service reform movement has been largely due. He asked the guests to rise and drink the health of the absent leader, which was done amid much cheering and hand-clapping. Then the Bishop introduced Charles J. Bonaparte, referring to him and Mr. MacVeagh conjointly as "men of girlish coyness."

Mr. Bonaparte said that in future the work of the National Civil Service Reform League should be more constructive than critical.

At this point the Governor entered the room, and was greeted by a storm of cheers. In introducing him as the next speaker, the Bishop referred to the plan of the St. Nicholas Society to send to the Queen of Holland a vase with a pedestal surrounded by four statues, adding that some one had suggested that one of the statues should be a Rough Rider as represented by Gov. Roosevelt. Another had said that this would not be well, as the Governor was not dead yet.

"No, he's not dead yet, thank God!" said the Bishop, "Let me introduce to you the Vice President-elect of the United States."

What the Governor said, in part, was as follows:

"In this State we have done much for civil service reform within the last two years. We have had a good law put on the statute books—a law in some respects better than the National law. It is administered by three gentlemen who are disinterestedly devoted to having it executed, and are intelligently desirous of executing it aright. I, of course, have had little to do with the supervision of their work personally, but I do not disclaim the responsibility for what they have done.

"I accept, and insist on absolute responsibility for the things done by my appointees, be those things well or ill done.

"I am near the end of my term of office in this State. For the next four years my life will be less strenuous. [Laughter.] But I am going out of office feeling that I have the right to come before you to-night and say that the State affairs are being conducted on a clean basis.

"From experience I will say that this association ought to have these chief aims: We should strive for a better standard of public service and should take purely non-political offices out of politics. Competitive examinations are only a means to our end."

Here the speaker told of the manner in which he had conducted examinations while at the head of the Police Department in this city.

"Some of you remember when I held that office," he said. "In fact, I think New York still has it in mind."

He went on to state that he thought strict written examinations proper in the case of admitting men into a department, but not in the matter of promotions.

"A test of that kind for promotion is no good," he said. "I remember that the Bishop here once recommended to me a certain Sergeant for promotion to a Captaincy. The Sergeant was Welsh. He is now a Captain. Another man who was recommended to me in the same way was Capt. Vredenburgh, whom the Paulist Fathers called to my attention.

"Maybe neither of them would have come under my eye for promotion had it not been for the words spoken in their behalf by the Bishop and the fathers. The examination test might not have brought them forward."

"Where are they now?" cried a voice from the rear of the room.

"They're both Captains in the city," answered the Governor, "and wherever they are, you can bet your life that they're all right."

"I can tell you that most of the men in the police force of New York will be glad to do good work if you give them a chance. It is idle to expect the impossible from men whose livelihoods, as well as the livelihoods of their families depend on their not putting themselves in a position where the ones in power over them can break their necks.

"In this movement of ours the bulk of the people must be back of us to make the reform stick. In the long run legislators and executives will give heed to emphatic public opinion, the kind that is not to be misunderstood. But we must have the two qualities of decency and common sense. We must work in the largest sense to keep our movement on a high moral basis and also continue to see that it remains on a level of hard common sense."

Wayne MacVeagh was the next speaker. He said:

"The Governor has told us that the next four years of his life will be less strenuous. I want to surprise him by saying that a large percentage of his fellow-townsmen will hear that with perfect equanimity." [Applause.]

The Governor blushed, but Mr. MacVeagh went on:

"You all know that this Governor is a man who never leaves one office until he has his hands safely on another."

The speaker sat down and was applauded for some minutes, while the Governor did not seem to enjoy himself particularly. Then the Bishop rose and said he would like to know what these personalities had to do with civil service reform. Mr. MacVeagh took the floor again.

"I want to tell you something about the Bishop," he began, and the toastmaster looked uneasy. "Only an hour or so ago the Bishop said to me: 'I'm sorry you don't smoke.' I replied that I had not as yet contracted any clerical vices, for which I thanked God. Then I reminded the Bishop that there were ladies in the room and that he, therefore, ought not to smoke himself. He was perplexed for a minute, but then he said: 'I must smoke, and I know how to solve the difficulty. I have a lady friend in this room, and whenever I say anything to her she always answers: "My dear Bishop, whatever you say is right." Now you know how he happens to be smoking at the present moment without being discourteous to the ladies."

When the laughter had subsided the Bishop announced that this levity was unseemly, and introduced Oscar S. Straus.

"Mr. Roosevelt," Mr. Straus began, "has just been telling us how the civil service laws should only be applied in a very few cases." Although nearly everybody laughed at this, the Governor himself did not even smile.

Mr. Straus compared the civil service reform movement with the movement against slavery fifty years ago, and prophesied a like victory.

The other speakers made brief remarks, for it was nearly midnight when it came their turn.

GRAVE VIOLATIONS OF LAW.

Civil Service Investigating Committee's Report Attacks the Administration—Carl Schurz's Retirement.

At the meeting held yesterday in the City Club by the National Civil Service Reform League, Carl Schurz presided. A long report of the Executive Committee was read. When the time came to read the report of the Investigating Committee on Violations of the Law, it was announced that some of the revelations made were such as to show a condition of affairs very much more serious than is believed to be generally understood by the public or by most of the members of the league. The report will be condensed and given out for publication in a few days. It is said to contain an attack on the present Administration.

The league decided, on motion of Henry A. Richmond of Buffalo, to ascertain from its counsel how the enforcement of the civil service laws could be effected by the withholding of salary payments to officials appointed in violation of those laws.

At the open session of the league at Carnegie Lyceum in the afternoon, Daniel C. Gilman, retiring President of Johns Hopkins University, was unanimously elected President for the coming year, and resolutions were adopted expressing regret that Carl Schurz had felt compelled to decline a re-election after eight years of zealous and efficient service. Mr. Schurz responded to the resolutions, and assured the league of the continuance of his efforts in the cause.

PET DOG LOVER'S TROUBLE

Architect Fryer Held Responsible for Debts of the Club.

He May Have to Pay Prizes Long Overdue—Elected Trustee Without His Knowledge.

William J. Fryer, the architect, is experiencing the inconveniences of being a lover of pet dogs and the unpleasantness of being elected a Trustee—without his knowledge—of an organization which later is dissolved, leaving him the only available person who can be sued. This situation has arisen out of the dissolution of the American Pet Dog Club, which, a year ago, had an exhibition in the Metropolitan Opera House.

There are several reminders of that exhibition still in existence in the way of unpaid prizes and other bills. Some of these have found their way into court, and in one of these actions, in which Mr. Fryer is a party defendant with the club, City Court Justices McCarthy, O'Dwyer, and Schuchman, sitting in General Term, handed down a decision yesterday. They held that the judgment taken against Mr. Fryer would have to stand.

This judgment was obtained by the attorney retained by the club to defend several actions brought against it, and who also collected some bills due the club. The lawyer did not deduct his fee from the money collected, and when the club dissolved he brought the present action.

The American Pet Dog Club gave its last exhibition at the Metropolitan Opera House Nov. 29 and 30, and Dec. 1, 1899. Many prizes were offered, and to all appearances the exhibition was a success. Nothing further was heard of the club until last March, when it was announced that the American Kennel Club had suspended Mrs. Walter Stanton, President of the Pet Dog Club; Mrs. C. Frederick Spaulding, Mrs. William Green, and Mrs. Robert K. Pritchard, Vice Presidents; Mrs. Robert Stokes, the Secretary, and, in fact, all the members of the club, because cash prizes to the value of nearly $3,000 had not been paid to exhibitors who had received awards. At the same time it was announced that the National Ladies' Kennel Association had been organized and that many of the members of the Pet Dog Club had joined the new organization.

Schuyler C. Hodge had acted as Superintendent for the Pet Dog Club at its exhibition, and he made an effort to have the prizes paid, and in fact did pay some bills out of his own pocket. It was about this time that William J. Woods, a lawyer, was retained by the club to look after a pressing claim for an electrician's bill.

The lawyer defended this and another action, and collected $100 due the club. He had expended some money, and his total bill was $60.63. The club did not pay it promptly, and he brought suit in the City Court. The process server in his affidavit of service says that when he handed the summons to Mr. Fryer the latter said:

"I don't know Mr. Woods, and I think it pretty small practice for a lawyer to serve me because I am a Trustee."

Mr. Fryer sent the summons to his counsel, John J. Gleason, and Mr. Gleason, supposing that Mr. Fryer wanted him to enter an appearance in the case, did so for "The American Pet Dog Club." A few days later he found out that Mr. Fryer claimed that he was not a Director of the club, so he withdrew his appearance, and at the same time Mr. Fryer returned the summons to Mr. Woods, saying that he had discovered that he was not a Trustee of the club. Later the judgment by default was taken against Mr. Fryer and the club. Mr. Fryer then appealed to the General Term of the City Court for relief.

In his affidavit Mr. Fryer says that he was only a member of the club, and not a Trustee; that about three years previous he was informed that he had been elected a Trustee, but he declined to serve, and he had no knowledge of any other election.

Mr. Hodge, in an affidavit made for Mr. Woods, says that Mr. Fryer was elected a Trustee at the annual meeting of 1899. He also says in his affidavit "that the corporation defendant owes about $3,000, and that under the law of the State, if the same be not paid, the Trustees are liable therefor, and that probably under those circumstances Mr. Fryer is not anxious to be considered a Trustee."

It is the prospect of being held liable for this indebtedness that is causing Mr. Fryer to fight the comparatively small claims of Mr. Woods, and he will take an appeal to the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court to have the matter settled.

DOUGLAS BEAT TRAVIS.

Match Play Rounds in Atlantic City Golf Tournament on Northfield Links.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., Dec. 14.—The match play rounds in the Atlantic City golf tournament at Northfield were inaugurated to-day under weather conditions that were far from favorable. The gale of wind that greeted the contestants handicapped the players out of all proportions, and the cold penetrated the golfers, so that golfing was not the keenest enjoyment. The sifting-down process of the second day's play has brought the contest to the semi-final and final rounds, and to-morrow the real struggle for the Atlantic City Cup will take place.

By far the most important match of the day was that between the present National amateur champion, Walter J. Travis, and former National amateur champion Findlay S. Douglas. Both had won their preliminary round matches in the morning, and were paired for the second round in the afternoon. They played consistent golf throughout, and Douglas defeated the champion at the home hole by 1 up.

This afternoon was the fourth meeting of Douglas and Travis this year. The first was here, in the Spring tournament, and Travis won 4 to 2. On the second occasion it was in the amateur championship tourney, and Travis won again by 2 up. The third time was two weeks ago at Lakewood and Travis won by 3 up and 2 to play.

Douglas—

The Wanamaker Store The Wanamaker Store The Wanamaker Store

LAST SATURDAY but One--Each Day the Rush Grows Greater---More COMFORT, Better Satisfaction Before the Last Week's Rush Begins. Come TO-DAY to

The Greatest of CHRISTMAS STORES

HERE are the most magnificent stocks of staple and fancy holiday goods ever brought together; and the broadest variety of goods that is gathered under one roof anywhere. The most popular and inexpensive goods that you could wish, are here; so are the finest and most exclusive that are to be found in Europe and America.

Such a stock of Jewelry as is matched in none but the most aristocratic jewelry stores, and at much lower prices than must be paid there. A Furniture Store with such a variety of the popular gift pieces, such as chairs, desks, toilet tables, etc., as cannot be found elsewhere. A Book Store that has no equal. A Candy Store with such a vast assortment of pure candies and candy holders as is nowhere else. A Men's Furnishing Store that has more and finer Neckwear from London, Paris and America than any exclusive store. Same of House Coats and Suspenders. A magnificent collection of Art Wares; and Marble Statuary. Then such marvelous variety as is found nowhere else, of pocket-books and purses, photograph frames, belts and buckles, fans, toilet articles, perfumes, women's neckwear, handkerchiefs, and other popular gift-things for men and women.

Best of all is the surety of true worth and goodness that goes with every article bought at Wanamaker's. And this assurance gives a sense of satisfaction to recipient as well as giver. There is—there can be—no distrust of quality in any article that comes from Wanamaker's. Here the Christmas instinct which seeks the best of its kind for giving, is most fully satisfied; yet the broad and masterful Wanamaker methods serve you for less cost than is possible where transactions are less broadly and skillfully conducted.

The store's holiday service is run on the most perfect system that human effort can organize, to serve you promptly and comfortably.

The decorations form a delightful Christmas picture that should be seen whether you have a purchase in mind or not. The church towers upward at one end of the Rotunda, and chimes and organ alternate in delightful Christmas music. Cupids are ringing the bells of Christmas, and Santa Claus and the evergreens complete the beautiful picture. Welcome.

Men's Overcoats

This Raglan at fifteen dollars has been the most popular overcoat that we ever knew. It's been a task for weeks to keep up a satisfactory supply. The Wanamaker Raglan is different from the general run. Compare it and you'll appreciate the difference—in the price as well as in style. Of all-wool rough-faced cheviot, Oxford gray and black. Also of frieze, serge lined; satin sleeve lining. Various better grades of Raglans.

This coat at $10 is a very good value. Of all-wool black frieze; lined with heavy serge. Very dressy. Would be reasonably priced at $12.

And this Oxford frieze overcoat at $12 is as good as any $15 coat we know.

Then there's this broad-shouldered, full-back, straight-hanging coat of rough-faced Oxford cheviot at $15. Most other good clothiers would ask at least five dollars more.

Second floor, Fourth avenue.

Men's Trousers

The ambition of the Wanamaker clothing store has steadily been to furnish the best possible value in worsted trousers. Hardly any doubt that this line at $5 excels. We don't know of equal value anywhere else. Most varied assortment of patterns, too—the latest, most tasteful designs that could be found. Second floor, Fourth avenue.

Boys' CLOTHING

Dress has a certain moral effect on a boy. Neglected appearance often goes hand-in-hand with indifferent manners. Good clothing never makes a gentleman—it does help to develop the boy into a gentleman.

We'll help you to help your boy. And our charges will be very moderate. This boys' clothing store is splendidly equipped—was never more helpful as to variety nor as to quality. In the matter of value-giving these few hints:

Vestee Suits of blue cheviot; with V-front vest to come close up to neck; 3 to 8-year sizes. $5 each.

Double-breasted Suits of mixed or striped cheviots; silk sewed throughout; all seams well stayed; extra trousers with each suit; 8 to 16 years. Price, $8.

Russian Blouse Suits—a very popular style. Excellent wearing quality and stylish as well. For boys of 3 to 8 years. Various grades, at $5, $6.50 and $7.50.

Sailor Suits of blue serge cheviot; well made and neatly trimmed; sizes 3 to 12 years. A handsome suit for $5.

Swell Top Coats of frieze, in blue, brown and Oxford gray; sizes 4 to 16 years. Price $5; another quality at $5.50.

Stylish, durable, double-breasted reefers of blue chinchilla with notched velvet collar; lined throughout; sizes 3 to 12 years. Price, $6.50.

Second floor, Ninth street.

HOSIERY Under-price

Values up to $2.75, now $1.

If you wish them for holiday giving we will put them in neat boxes without extra charge. Broadway.

Silk HANDKERCHIEFS And Mufflers

There's a certain softness and richness about silken articles of dress which endears them perennially to the hearts of luxury-loving people. Take these silk handkerchiefs and mufflers, for example—people are buying them just now more than ever before. And, consequently, with the forethought which characterizes the composition of Wanamaker stocks, our assortment of them is richer and wider, too, as befits the demand. Styles don't change materially, from year to year, in these conservative articles, but the newest ideas are all represented here:

Silk Handkerchiefs for Men—

Plain hemstitched, at 25c, 35c, 50c, 75c, $1, $1.50, and $2; with silk embroidered initials, at 25c, 50c, 75c, and $1. Colored border and fancy colored handkerchiefs, 50c, 75c, and $1.

Silk Handkerchiefs for Women—

At 25c, 50c, 75c, and $1—Handsomely embroidered and trimmed.

Mufflers for Men and Women—

Black, cream and fancy colored mufflers, in great variety of patterns, at 50c, 75c, $1, $1.50, $2, $2.50, $3 and $7 each. Broadway.

Women's NECKWEAR

It's a dainty showing, this holiday collection of pretty things imported for my lady's wear. Whatever is newest, freshest, most captivating in these combinations of ribbons, laces and other delicate fabrics is here. If your idea is to purchase them for Christmas gifts, you'll be sorely tempted to keep them for yourself:

Fichus, trimmed with Valenciennes lace, $1 and $1.10; of chiffon with accordion-plaited ruffle, $2.25 to $8.25.

Boas of taffeta and Liberty silk, and ostrich feather boas with chenille ends in black, gray, castor and white, $4 to $35.

Tailor-made neckwear, in many styles and combinations of color, 50c to $4.50.

Broadway.

MUSIC and ATHLETICS

Seems to be a close association between the two. It is always easier to march behind a stirring band than to walk without such a stimulus. Even Indian clubs swing more smoothly in time to music. Hence there's a peculiar appropriateness in showing the implements of these two important pursuits in one corner of the basement. And a mighty interesting corner it is.

The great Orchestrion pours forth its Wagner or the Sousa marches upon delighted ears. Other smaller musical instruments, in great variety, are here. The Columbia Graphophone and the Zonophone demonstrate how successful "talking machines" can be, and there's a goodly collection of records for both. And the charms of the Regina Music Box are daily securing new members for the Regina Club.

Then, in the realm of the sporting goods, are cameras and photographic supplies of every description. There are pipes, pipe racks, in original designs, and smokers' articles generally. The Golf enthusiast will have many claims made upon his interest—golf clubs and balls of all well-known brands. There are some complete golf sets which are especially intended for Christmas gifts. Prices run from $3.50 to $25 a set, according to the assortment of clubs and balls they contain. Among the bicycles the 1901 Orient is pre-eminent, but second only to this 20th century model is the 1900 Orient, on which, together with the 1900 Rodman, Continent and Continental wheels, in all sizes for men, prices are greatly reduced. Motor vehicles are here, too, in various styles, propelled by steam or gasolene. Many are the appliances designed to supply the needed exercise indoors, when winter storms rage without. Here is mention of a few:

Whitely Exercisers, $1.50 to $4.
Punching Bags, $1.25 to $7.
Fencing Foils, pair, $1.50 to $5.
Patterson Exercisers, $1.50 to $3.
Boxing Gloves, set, $1.25 to $4.50.
Fencing Masks, $3 to $4.50. Basement.

Men's HOUSE COATS

This is one of the best offerings ever made before Christmas. Hundreds of wives and sisters have already planned to give husband or brother a house coat. This chance saves almost half the expected cost. Splendid coats—magnificent variety.

They are made from all-wool reversible cloths, in plain and fancy styles. Priced as follows:

Coats Reduced from $6 to $3.50
Coats Reduced from $11 to $6.50

Second floor.

Concerning Offerings in Our Three Shoe Stores

The main store is handiest—we'll tell first of the doings there. Just a single specimen value each for men, women and children. Take a look at these men's shoes, that we're selling at $3.90—we'll be pleased to have a comparison with the usual $5 shoe. So will you. These are shown in patent and enameled leather, box and wax calf, kidskin and tan oil grain leather. All best new shapes—staple styles as well.

The Wanamaker-Reliable Shoe for women, is $3 a pair. They're better than any shoe we ever saw at anywhere near the price. All the best leathers. All the various weights for any sort of wear or weather. All the newest, best approved styles.

Excellent lines of boys' shoes—particularly those at $2.50 to $3.50. Durability and sightliness are essential features to every pair of boys' shoes in stock. No less care is given to them in form and finish than that which characterizes all our men's high-grade shoes.

Slippers for men, for women, for children—an unmatched collection of fine slippers commands the interested attention of holiday shoppers. Gathered to meet almost every fancy, to accommodate almost every purse.

In the basement, bargain shoes for women and children. Here are 500 pairs of women's button and lace shoes at $1—values run up to $3. A lot comprising a dozen styles of women's shoes, all sorts of good leathers, some brand-new, others from regular stock, values up to $5. Choice at $2.30. Children's shoes at 75c, 85c, 95c, $1 and $1.40. To every price add at least a third—for a fair valuation. Leggings of velvet, in the new colors, at $1.25—excellent value.

In the Bargain Store for men and boys, on the Ninth street corner of Fourth avenue, opposite the main store, are 12,000 pairs of Men's Shoes that are priced at an average of one-third under value. May require a little longer than usual to find just the style you wish, or to be properly fitted. The saving is worth it. The shoes are all desirable.

$1.25 FANCY SILK At 75c a Yard

This is a fortunate purchase of fine and beautiful silks that are superb for holiday gifts of dress or waist patterns. They have all the refined charm of the best $1.25 silks, and will give an effect as a gift that is far greater than their cost.

Many are in evening colors shot with white; in some cases the white forms the dot, the figure or the spray, on the pinks, olives and lavenders; sometimes the darker colors peep through. Then again black prevails and lighter colors peep through like little jewels in blue, green, red, gold, lavender—all on black. $1.25 silks at 75c a yard, Rotunda.

Under-price Goods New Lots in the Basement Store

The holiday thought is apparent here and there throughout this miscellaneous gathering. But there is much, too, in which there is none of that sentiment. Just every-day-needed things to wear, and to use about the house. All of it is worthy, or it wouldn't be here. All of it is priced much under regular values:

And we are ready with a well-chosen display of stylish hats of chinchilla and mink. Some combine December with the roses of June, others are charmingly trimmed with velvets, pompons or aigrettes. Prices vary between $18 and $35.

Here likewise is a gathering of children's imported trimmed bonnets—quaint and childish, as befits their youthful wearers. They're reduced one-half, from $20 to $10.

Fine Umbrellas

There's hardly any more popular place in this building now, for holiday shoppers generally, than this splendid umbrella store. There's a wider assortment of fine latest styles in umbrellas, for both men and women, than ever before.

Prices run from 50c to $27.50. Best selling lines are around the $2 to $5 groups. And there's unusually good choosing among them, exceptionally good values. Numerous elegant new styles for men and women, that will interest seekers of suitable gifts.

Velour CAPES

In this collection of Capes of Velour du Nord, the height of luxury and richness in wraps is reached. The often misapplied term "artistic" may fairly be used in speaking of them; for they were designed and produced with the loving care that differentiates art from commerce. The fabric yields readily to variety in treatment, and lavish trimming with jet and braid. The exquisite designs are exclusive, and, with one or two exceptions, not duplicated. But these sumptuous capes have worn their welcome with us threadbare, hence these prices—a quarter below value:

Capes that were $48 to $130 now $36 to $97.50

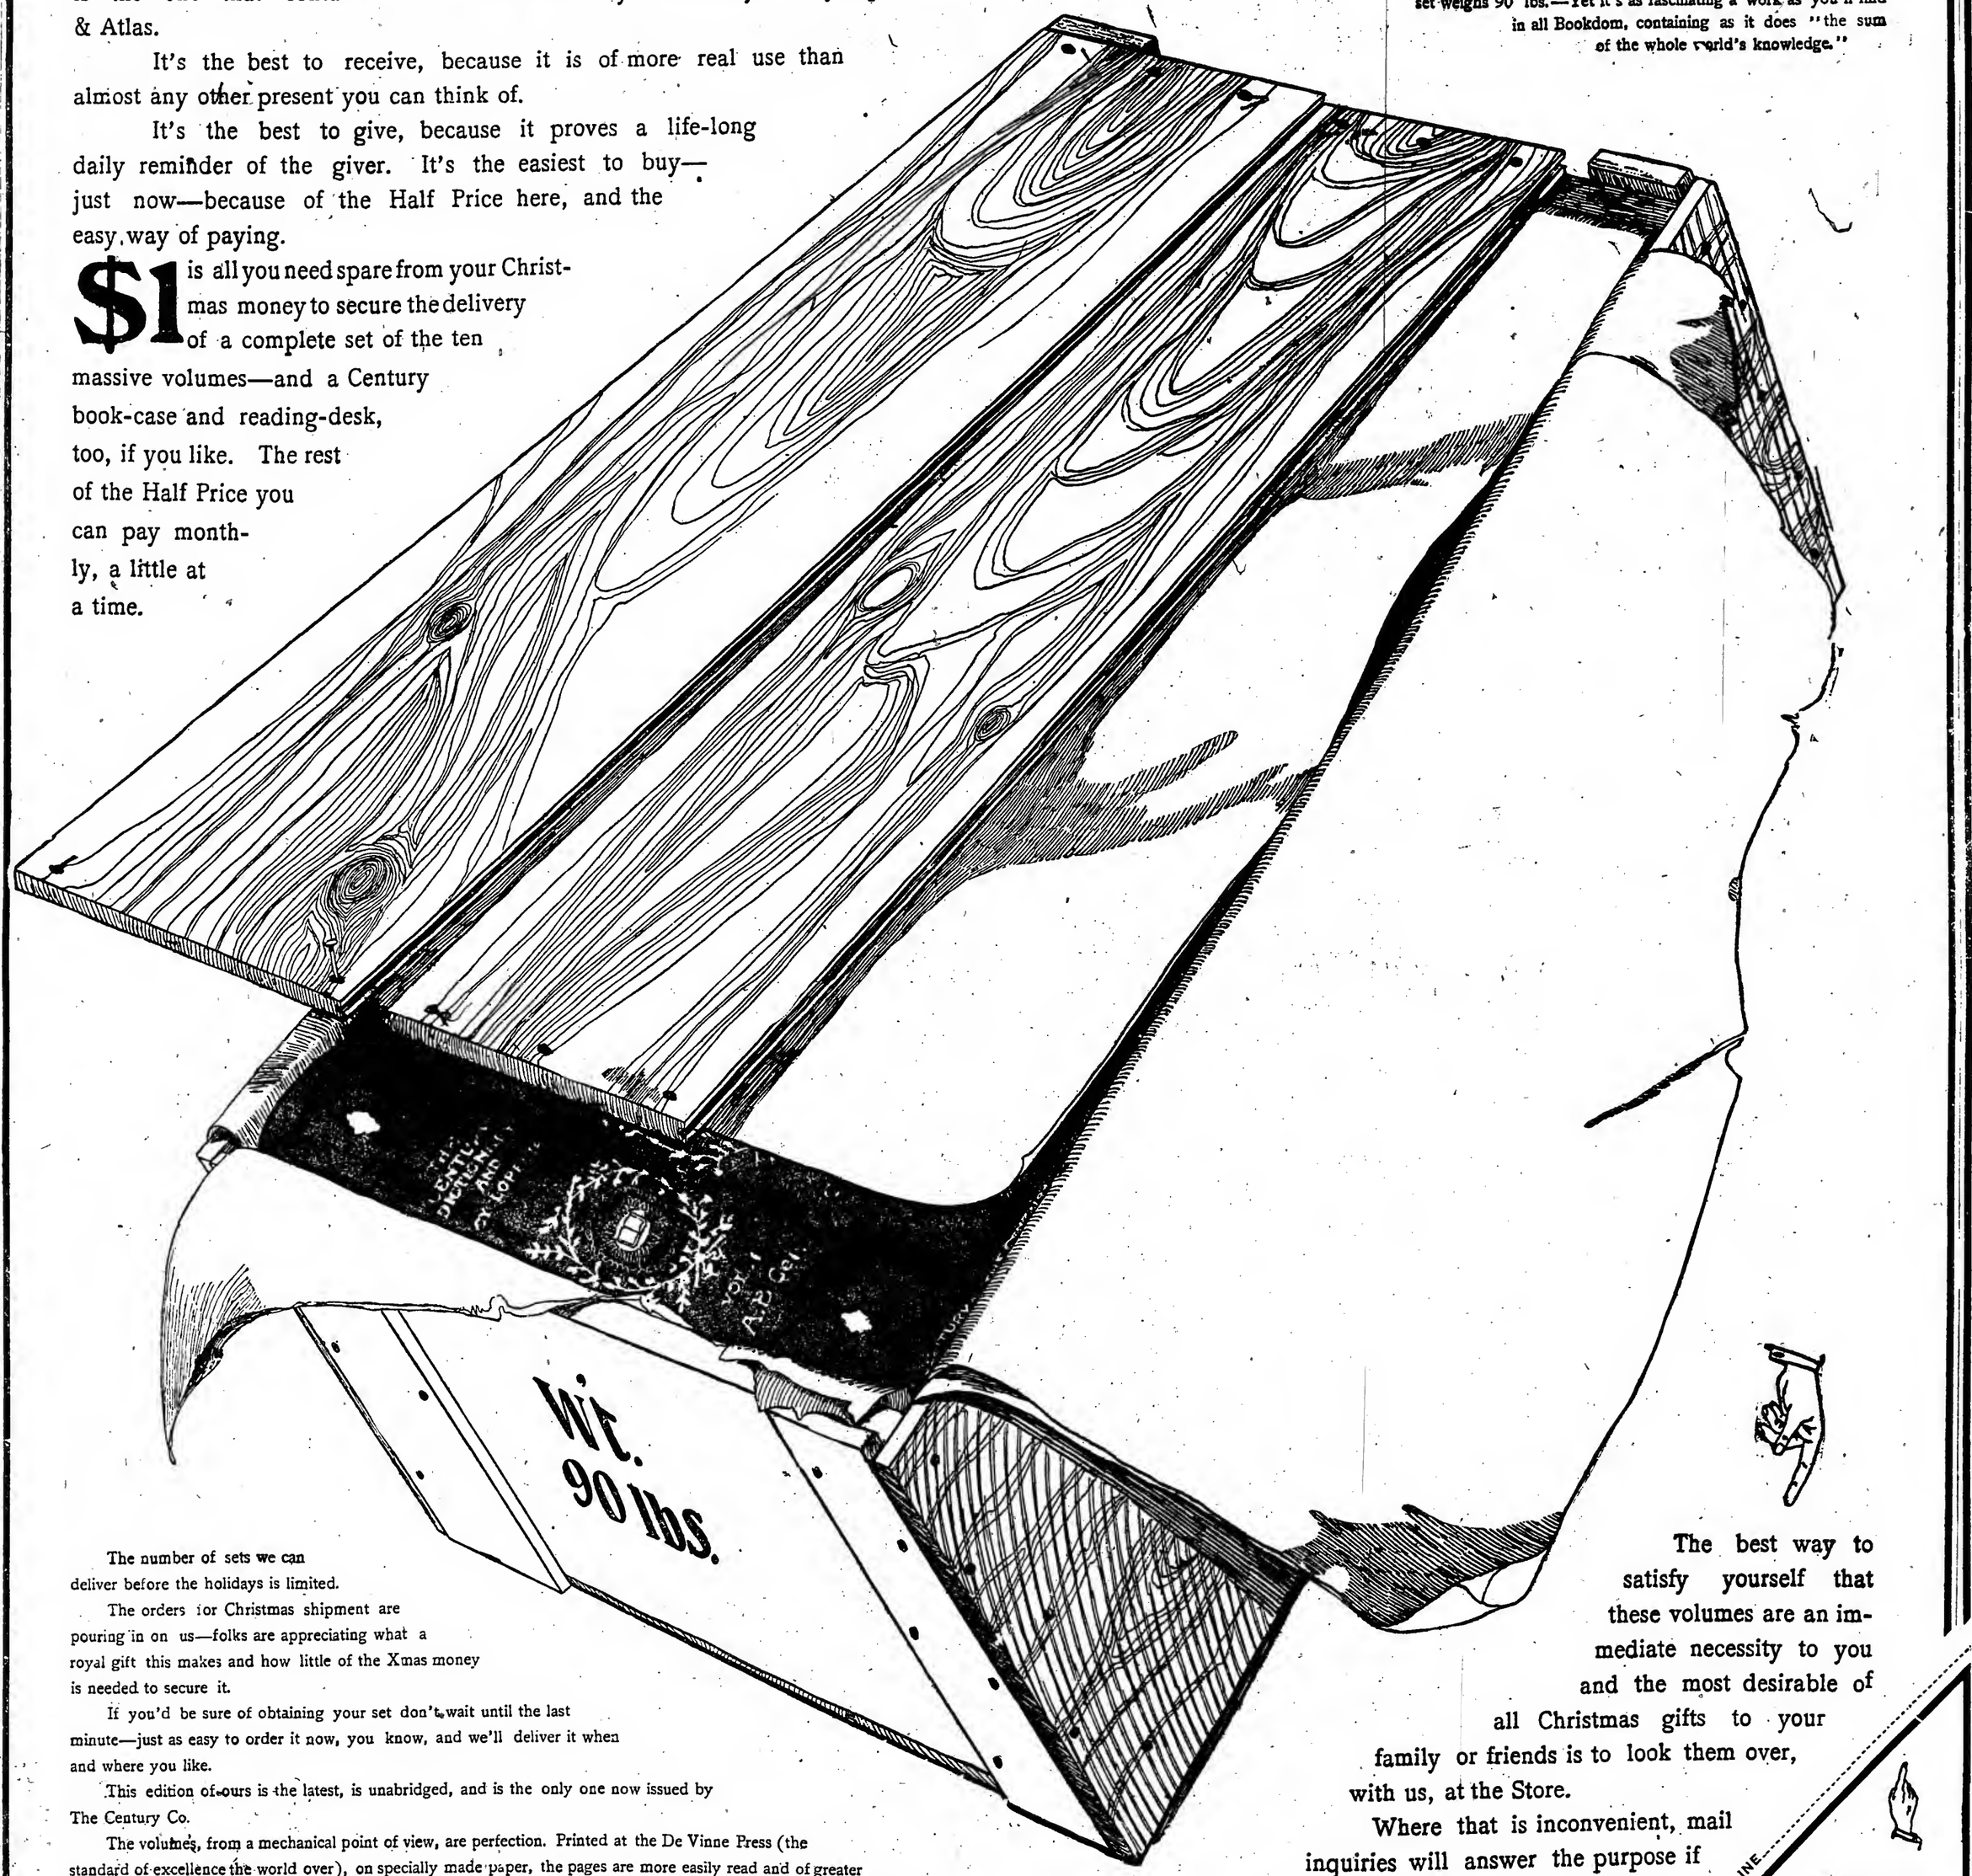
The "Century" isn't what you'd call light reading, for a set weighs 90 lbs.—Yet it's as fascinating a work as you'll find in all Bookdom, containing as it does "the sum of the whole world's knowledge."



The number of sets we can deliver before the holidays is limited.

The orders for Christmas shipment are pouring in on us—folks are appreciating what a royal gift this makes and how little of the Xmas money is needed to secure it.

If you'd be sure of obtaining your set don't wait until the last minute—just as easy to order it now, you know, and we'll deliver it when and where you like.

This edition of ours is the latest, is unabridged, and is the only one now issued by The Century Co.

The volumes, from a mechanical point of view, are perfection. Printed at the De Vinne Press (the standard of excellence the world over), on specially made paper, the pages are more easily read and of greater artistic merit than those of any other reference work in existence. The bindings are at once handsome and durable, as befits volumes destined to be in constant daily use.

The Century Bookcase has been found a real necessity, as the massive volumes, needed for continual and instant consultation, are thus kept in the manner best adapted to quick reference. The case is of polished oak, standing just desk high, and is easily wheeled from one room to another.

There's no need for any one to try to get along without "the great work" now. There's a complete display at the Wanamaker store.

The best way to satisfy yourself that these volumes are an immediate necessity to you and the most desirable of all Christmas gifts to your family or friends is to look them over, with us, at the Store.

Where that is inconvenient, mail inquiries will answer the purpose if sent us promptly. The coupon in the corner will bring you full information if you mail it to us.

JUDGE WEPT, BOY MURDERER ATE CANDY

Pronouncing sentence of twenty years' imprisonment upon fourteen-year-old Alexander Stewart, the youngest murderer ever arraigned before him, Justice Edward L. Fursman, ordinarily grave and dignified, was so moved yesterday by the precocious depravity and utter indifference of the young prisoner that he bowed his head in his hands and wept bitterly, while the hardened court officers and hangers-on were visibly agitated. Justice Fursman is deeply attached to his own small grandson, who is about Stewart's age.

Struck on the head with a brick at the age of five, young Stewart has since been precociously vicious and wholly devoid of all moral sense, say the alienists appointed to examine him. An incorrigible inmate of every reformatory institution in the city, he has long exhibited signs of criminal degeneracy. While an inmate of the House of Refuge in September last he became enraged at his playmate, Edward Peisel, and elaborated a plan to revenge himself by killing the boy in cold blood. Upon pretense of wanting to play at shaving his mates, he induced Peisel to procure a shoemaker's knife from the shop, and, after compelling him to sharpen it for several minutes on the sole of his own shoe, Stewart tilted Peisel's head back and drove the knife deep into the lad's throat.

All efforts of charitable persons to effect his reformation were of no avail, the boy refusing to even talk to missionaries. Justice Fursman appointed a commission to examine into Stewart's sanity. The decision was reached that the boy was unquestionably sane. Justice Fursman accepted a plea of guilty of manslaughter Wednesday. He did not wish to send the boy to the electric chair, and was in a quandary as to what disposition to make of him.

When brought into court for sentence yesterday, Stewart, neatly dressed in knickerbockers, his head scarcely reaching to the railing near which he stood, was absolutely unimpressed by the solemnity of the scene. Justice Fursman gazed at the young criminal benignantly and with a catch in his voice, said:

"I do not suppose that anything I can say to you, young man, will be of any particular value to you hereafter. I am frank to say I had hoped you would be found insane, and you owe it to a humane District Attorney that your life is spared. The very atrocity of the crime you committed, its unparalleled cruelty and cold-bloodedness, was such as to make me think you insane."

Justice Fursman's emotion at this juncture overcame him, and, with streaming eyes, he dropped his face in his hands, while great sobs shook his frame. Court attendants moved uneasily, and the father, sister, and aunt of the boy crept violently. Stewart, apparently drumming on the bar, allowed his gaze to wander listlessly past the bowed head of the black-gowned Judge and rest indifferently upon the panel of Justice behind him. Shifting his hands to his pockets, he furtively glanced at the officer, standing with tear-dimmed eyes at his side then slipped a piece of candy into his mouth. Mastering his emotion, Justice Fursman continued:

"I can do but one thing in your case; young as you are, you must go to State prison. You will be surrounded by good influences there. To a boy of your age there remains always hopes of recovery, and yet it is only just to say that the taint of the prison will always remain with you. The odor of the cell will cling to your garments forever. Yet, for your own sake and the sake of society, I feel that you should be put out of the way for a long time. The sentence of the Court is that you be confined for twenty years at hard labor in Sing Sing."

The Justice turned away to dry his eyes, and, with absolute unconcern, Stewart walked past his weeping father and sister, never vouchsafing them a glance, still munching his candy, and, passing over the Bridge of Sighs, in two hours was on his way to begin his long imprisonment.

SING SING, N. Y., Dec. 14.—Alexander Stewart, the boy murderer, arrived here at 3:02 P. M. The smallest suit of convict's stripes was brought out, and the trousers legs had to be cut down with a pair of shears before he could put them on, and the blouse was so big that it could have been wrapped twice around his little body. A special suit will be made for him. He was then placed at the rear of the smallest man in the lockstep procession, but he could not reach his shoulders with his hands, as the regulations require, and had to allow them to rest upon his waist.

The head keeper, who has been there twenty-five years, said the boy, with possibly one exception, is the smallest prisoner he ever saw brought into the place.

Commutation for good conduct will reduce the boy's term from twenty to thirteen and a half years.

Sixty Years in Prison for Murder.

CAMDEN, N. J., Dec. 14.—Edward Oswald of this city, who murdered his wife and child in April, 1899, was to-day sentenced to sixty years at hard labor in the New Jersey State Prison by Supreme Court Justice Garrison. Oswald is thirty-six years of age.

FATHER CHASES LOVELORN SON

Aided by a Policeman He Overhauls Youth and Takes Him to Station.

Pedestrians along Fourth Avenue, in the vicinity of Thirteenth Street, yesterday morning had their attention attracted by the sight of a young man running at top speed up the avenue, followed closely by a fleet-footed man of elderly appearance, and he in turn by a big policeman.

The chase led up Fourth Avenue to Sixteenth Street, where the old man and the policeman overtook the fugitive. The trio proceeded to the Yorkville Court, where the prisoner was arraigned as Charles F. Goepel, Jr., of 237 Tinton Avenue. The elderly man explained that he was Charles F. Goepel, Sr., of 31 West Thirtieth Street, a manufacturer, doing business at 137 East Thirteenth Street. He asserted that for some time he had been annoyed by his son's queer actions, and was confident that his mental condition was not good.

It was brought out that the young man appeared at the East Thirteenth Street place of business yesterday morning as usual, and in some manner there arose a quarrel between father and son. The former threatened to have his son arrested, and the young man dashed to the street, followed by the father.

"I'm not insane," cried the young man when arraigned in court. "I am in love with a young woman, and I'm determined to marry her. My father does not like her, and that is why this charge is made against me. But I don't care what my father or anybody else thinks about her, I am determined to marry her." The young man gave the name of his sweetheart as Matilda Seamen, but refused to give her address.

He went on to tell how, six months ago, they had become very much attached to each other, and had agreed to marry, but their parents had objected and put every obstacle in their way. Since then, the young man admits, he has been "going the pace."

"Had they let me alone," he cried, "I would have been married now, and this would never have happened. As it is I am a wreck and am charged with insanity."

The prisoner was taken to Bellevue for examination.

POLICEMEN HEAVILY FINED.

Coyne Charged with Abusing a Citizen; Scanlon with Neglect.

The heaviest fines that have been imposed by the Police Board in many months were assessed at Thursday's meeting of the board on Patrolman Michael J. Coyne and James J. Scanlon of the Grand Central Station. Coyne and Scanlon were fined forty-two and thirty-five days' pay, respectively.

Coyne is the man who some time ago arrested the Rev. F. J. Clay Moran because the latter inquired why the officer treated an old man standing near the Grand Central Station as he did. Three charges were made against Coyne of being off duty without leave. Scanlon had charges against him of being in a saloon during working hours and of holding conversations with Coyne at a street corner.

He won the title by defeating the veteran champion "Joe" Goss in a long battle. He never fought in the prize ring after being defeated by Sullivan.

LOAN COMPANY'S AFFAIRS

Anglo-American Officers Accused Before Judge Lacombe.

REFLECTION ON STATE COURTS

Pennsylvania Official Writes that Stockholders Fear Their Rights Will Not Be Protected.

Joseph M. Dickey and Edward B. Dickinson, who were appointed receivers of the Anglo-American Savings and Loan Association by Justice Maddox of the Supreme Court, qualified yesterday and took charge of the company's office in the Home Life Building. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon the application made in the Federal Circuit Court by Pennsylvania shareholders for the appointment of a receiver came up before Judge Lacombe. When the case was called Deputy Attorney General Kisselburg asked leave to be heard.

"Have you intervened or given notice of intervention in this case?" asked Judge Lacombe.

"No, your Honor."

"Then the Court can't hear you."

William Hepburn Russell of the firm of Russell & Winslow, representing the plaintiffs, submitted a brief and made an address upon the subject of the Court's jurisdiction. Mr. Russell read a letter from Frederick W. Fleitz, Deputy Attorney General of Pennsylvania, who is one of the counsel for the complainants, in which Mr. Fleitz said:

> I had hoped to be present on that occasion to make a statement on behalf of the many thousands of shareholders resident in this State who are practically obliged to look to the Federal court for a protection of their interests. I am satisfied that there is no way for them to protect themselves through the courts of this Commonwealth, and they have serious misgivings about the protection of their rights in the State courts of New York, in view of the standing and influence of the officers of the Anglo-American.

In the concluding part of his argument, in which he endeavored to convince the Court of the necessity of having a Federal receiver, Mr. Russell made grave charges against the officers and Directors of the association and the Banking Department. He said in part:

"I do not hesitate to say to your Honor, in view of the notorious proceedings in this case, that we invoke the jurisdiction of this court because we believe that here, and here alone, can the outside stockholders of this corporation receive the full protection to which they are entitled. Here is a bill that shows upon its face that the liabilities of this corporation exceed its assets; that the Directors and officers have committed various ultra vires acts and made ultra vires contracts; that the officers and Directors are men of great prominence in this community, and that the court that takes hold of the administration of this estate must do so with a firm hand.

"This bill shows that for three years past the Superintendent of Banks of the State of New York has been allowing this association to send out reports covering up the facts about its speculative investments in real estate to the extent of some two or three millions of dollars. The affidavits filed show that at the annual meeting of the stockholders held in January, 1900, the President and Directors of the association made speeches to the stockholders, telling them that their money was invested in first mortgages, when, in fact, they were making speculative investments, and their pretended first mortgage loans were neither more nor less than pretended loans to an employe of the corporation, who was neither more nor less than a 'dummy' stockholder and 'dummy' borrower."

William B. Hornblower, for the association, said that Mr. Russell had gone far outside of the record.

"He has," said Mr. Hornblower, "impugned the good character of high State officials, and he has read a letter from the Deputy Attorney General of Pennsylvania, reflecting upon the courts of the State of New York, a highly improper proceeding."

Mr. Hornblower said he believed the receivers named by the State court were good men. One of them, Mr. Dickey, was a brother of a Supreme Court Judge, and the other, Mr. Dickinson, had made an excellent record in winding up the affairs of the Granite State Building and Loan Association. The attorneys for the association, he said, had no foreknowledge as to whom Judge Maddox would select as receivers. No sufficient cause, he said, had been shown why the Federal court should take charge of the association.

Judge Lacombe announced at the conclusion of the arguments that he would take the matter under advisement.

John D. Vermeule, Vice President of the Anglo-American Association, when asked yesterday about the charge of collusion between the company's officers and the State Banking Department, said:

"It is all bosh. Of course, if the enemies of the association and the politicians are determined to throw the association into the hands of a receiver, we can't help that."

EXPERT KINSLEY DENOUNCED.

Lawyer Goldfogle Calls Him a Rogue—Musher Convicted.

Congressman-elect Henry T. Goldfogle, counsel for Nathan Musher, on trial for forgery before Judge Newburger, in General Sessions, yesterday, bitterly attacked expert testimony in general, and particularly Handwriting Expert William J. Kinsley, who testified in the Molineux trial and who was also a State witness against Musher. Summing up his case, Judge Goldfogle said that Kinsley had testified that Musher had written the body of three checks, which Isaac Blumberg, recalled to the stand, swore that he had written. Kinsley, on the stand, he continued, was unable to correctly identify Blumberg's handwriting. Ridiculing the expert's poses in the witness chair, Judge Goldfogle said:

"Kinsley could not correctly tell the handwriting of a person, even if the liberty or life of the man he has sworn into the electric chair depended upon it. This man, who sends men to the electric chair and into the confines of State prisons, who is in the pay of the District Attorney, and upon whose evidence indictments are found, could not tell Blumberg's handwriting on the witness chair. Tell me whether, on the testimony of that fraud and fakir, you will send Musher to prison. I have used hard words, and I have nothing to take back. I tell you, the testimony of this man Kinsley has developed the fact that he is a rascal of the deepest dye.

"It is high time, for the protection of society and the rights of man, that juries should frown upon the testimony of these so-called experts. Things have got to such a stage that it becomes dangerous for any man to place himself at the mercy of these experts. No one is safe, not even the Judge presiding at this trial, if he was involved in any matter where handwriting was questioned. My heart has gone out to the hundreds of men who may have been convicted upon the testimony of Kinsley. I have not words enough at my command to picture what a rogue, rascal, scoundrel, and fakir Kinsley is, and I appeal to you, gentlemen of the jury, not to place the slightest reliance upon his testimony."

Mr. Kinsley said that it was his intention to consult his lawyer in regard to Judge Goldfogle's statements and to obtain redress if possible in the courts.

Musher was convicted by the jury of forgery in the second degree and will be sentenced Thursday next. He is a broker, twenty-four years old. He lived at 156 Henry Street. He was arrested in Europe on the charge of forging an indorsement to a note for $2,000 signed with the name of "Mo" Levy.

SHORT SHRIFT FOR ROBBERS.

Arreated, Indicted, and Sentenced Within Three Days.

Arrested on Wednesday, indicted on Thursday, and sentenced on Friday was the new record established by the District Attorney's office in the case of George Becker and Albert Green, colored, charged by Gottlieb Albrecht, a sixty-year-old resident of Meriden, Conn., with robbing him of a draft for $707, $180 in cash, and a gold watch and pin.

Albrecht came here Wednesday. In the evening he was pulled into a hallway in Greenwich Street and robbed. Detective Mokney captured Becker and Green as they endeavored to cash the draft at the office of Speyer & Co. They were arraigned on Thursday and indicted the same day. Before Judge Foster both pleaded guilty yesterday, and Becker was sentenced to Sing Sing for five years. Green, who is twenty-two years old, was sent to the Elmira Reformatory. Albrecht will sail for Europe to-day.

MORRISON JURY DISAGREES.

Case Will Now Go Over Until the Spring Term.

ELDORADO, Kan., Dec. 14.—After being out four days the jury in the case of Jessie Morrison, tried on the charge of killing Mrs. Olin Castle, reported to Judge Shinn shortly after noon to-day their inability to agree. They stood nine for acquittal and three for conviction. The jury was at once discharged. The case will now go over to the Spring term.

POSTMASTER COMMITS SUICIDE.

Major A. C. Reinoehl of Lancaster, Penn., Found Dead in His Office.

LANCASTER, Penn., Dec. 14.—Major A. C. Reinoehl, Postmaster of this city and a prominent member of the Lancaster bar, was found dead in his office to-day, having committed suicide.

The gas jets were turned on full, and the crack under the door was stopped up by his coat, while cushions did similar duty at the windows. Financial troubles are ascribed as the cause.

Major Reinoehl was a member of the preliminary examining committee of the bar, and a meeting of that body was held in his office last night, adjourning at 10 o'clock, when he parted with his associates in apparently joyful mood. He was sixty years of age. He entered the civil war as a private and came out a Major. He had always taken an active part in politics and was Deputy Secretary of the Commonwealth under Govs. Geary and Hartranft. He also was a member of the State Assembly in 1868, 1870, and 1871.

EXPRESS WRECKS WAY TRAIN.

PITTSBURG, Penn., Dec. 14.—The day express, No. 8, from Chicago, on the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago, at 6:30 o'clock this morning collided with the Leetsdale accommodation, east bound, at Edgeworth, Penn., near here. Both trains were wrecked, and eleven persons were injured.

The list of injured includes Oscar White, fireman No. 8, fatally hurt; Dorsey Wise, baggagemaster on accommodation, will die; R. L. Stevens of New York, breastbone injured and unable to speak above a whisper; he is an invalid, and is in a serious condition, but is being taken home; J. E. Hansen of Chicago, hurt about the head and face; Mrs. Hansen, his wife; William Fischer, Ada Fischer, fourteen years old, his daughter.

A mistake in the signals, it is said, caused the accident. The accommodation had stopped at Edgeworth, and the passengers were thronging into the coaches when the heavy locomotive hauling the express came thundering up the track. The engineer applied the air, but was not able to stop the express in time to avert a collision, and the engine crashed into the accommodation train. The express locomotive plunged into the smoking car and coaches of the accommodation, which were thrown from the track. A large crowd ran to the assistance of the injured, and in a short time they were all extricated from their perilous positions and removed to the station and physicians summoned.

ATTACHING A MONUMENT.

Stone Which Marked Woman's Grave to be Sold for Debt.

As the outcome of a suit brought by a Brooklyn firm of monument makers, a monument which marked the grave of a woman in Bay Side Cemetery, South Woodhaven, has been removed and is to be sold to satisfy a judgment obtained by the makers.

The suit was brought in the Queens County Supreme Court by Charles and Gustave Benisch, monument workers, whose yards are at Jamaica Avenue and Crescent Street, Brooklyn. The Benisches claim that in June, 1898, they made to the order of Isaac Oppenheimer; then living on Madison Avenue, Manhattan, a monument which was placed over the grave of Oppenheimer's wife in Bay Side Cemetery.

The price of the monument was $140. Not receiving pay for the stone, as they allege, the firm brought suit, and obtained judgment for the amount claimed, the case going by default. A writ of attachment against the monument was issued, and it was seized. The monument is to be sold at auction at the yard of Benisch Brothers next Saturday.

Charles Benisch says that the suit was brought primarily with a view to testing the constitutionality of the new lien law, designed especially for the protection of men engaged in his line of business. The suit, however, he said, had not been defended.

COMMITTEE OF FIFTEEN

Completed by the Appointment of Five New Members.

Ex-Judge Olcott to Forward Charges Against Inspector Cross and Capt. Herlihy.

The Committee of Fifteen was formally restored yesterday to its full numerical strength by the choice of five new members. One vacancy, hitherto unreported, was caused by the withdrawal of the Rev. R. L. Paddock of the Pro-Cathedral. The new members of the committee are:

Austen G. Fox, a lawyer, of 45 Wall Street, who is identified with the Citizens' Union and has been prominent as a public prosecutor in conjunction with the District Attorney's office.

George Haven Putnam, President of the G. P. Putnam's Sons' Publishing Company, who was foreman of the March Grand Jury, which considered vicious conditions.

Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman of Columbia College, of the Educational Alliance, and President of the Tenement House Building Company.

W. J. O'Brien, President of the Granite Cutters' Association, who in 1899 was defeated as the Republican and independent candidate for Sheriff by W. F. Grell.

A. J. Smith, President of the Central Federated Union.

With Messrs. O'Brien and A. J. Smith the committee has, with Prof. Adler and Charles Sprague Smith, four members who are directly or indirectly allied to labor interests.

The announcement of the choice of two sub-committees on selection was made at a meeting of the committee at the offices of George Foster Peabody, which was attended by all of the eleven members, except the Rev. Mr. Paddock and Dr. Adler. Jacob H. Schiff called the meeting to order and Mr. Peabody was Secretary. The session, which was a secret one, lasted only a few minutes.

The next session of the committee will be on Wednesday afternoon next at Mr. Peabody's offices, when it will formally organize and a committee of three on plan and scope will report. The appointees on this committee will not be named. Mr. Baldwin said there would be no more withdrawals.

Ex-Judge Olcott will on Monday forward the formal charges and specifications against Inspector Cross and Capt. Herlihy, and the specific charges of insults to clergymen by the accused, to President York.

"I shall not," said Judge Olcott yesterday, "deal with sequestered vice, I shall not go into the resorts of the Red Light district, I shall deal with the open, flaunting polluting vice, patent to those who walked the streets of the Pro-Cathedral district. I shall have in view the demoralizing effect, the bad glaring features of the traffic which could be seen by all, old or young, going to and fro in the neighborhood. And as to the young, I shall be prepared to show the influences for evil on them by citing as results what public school children who saw and heard what was going on wrote on their school books.

"The specifications will be more direct against the Captain than against the Inspector; but what will be proved against Herlihy will be proved against Cross, as it was his duty to see what was passing in his district.

"I at first went to work to obtain my own evidence. But I freely acknowledge that soon valuable evidence poured in from the various purity associations. My charges would now be in the hands of the Police Commission but for evidence that came in late and had to be injected into the charges. I feel that I have a complete case, and that I shall prove that the accused were guilty of inefficiency and neglect of duty in not preventing what was seen by citizens of every degree."

Christian Endeavor Quarterly Meeting.

The Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman presided at the quarterly meeting of the New York City Christian Endeavor Union, held at Central Presbyterian Church, in West Fifty-seventh Street, last evening. The principal address was by the Rev. Dr. Francis E. Clark of Boston, founder of the Christian Endeavor Society. Mr. Clark's subject was "Christian Endeavor and Good Citizenship." He called upon members of the society, whether Republicans or Democrats, to vote for civic righteousness.

A BOGUS "SALVAGE SALE."

Circular Offers Fine Goods at Very Low Prices.

A circular advertising "a sale of salvage goods from the White Star steamship Cymric" is being mailed to many private houses about the city. The document states that the bulk of the cargo of the Cymric, which was damaged by fire last August, has been turned over to "the wholesale trade" by "The London Marine Insurance Company," and that an agent of those who have acquired the valuable merchandise from the cargo will call on the recipient of the circular and sell the most beautiful articles for ridiculously low prices.

On one page of the circular are pasted three samples of cloth. One of these is "pure French silk," and is priced at $10 for twenty yards; another is labelled "pure Irish and French linen handkerchiefs, $1 per dozen"; the third is marked "pure Irish and French linen towels, $1 per dozen."

John Lee, Manager of the White Star Line office in this city, said yesterday that he had seen one several months ago, but that he had no idea who was sending them out. He added that they were certainly fraudulent. It was learned that there never was such a corporation as "The London Marine Insurance Company," which is named in the circular.

SMALLPOX STILL SPREADING.

Two New Cases Reported, Bringing the Total to Fifty-four.

Smallpox appeared yesterday in widely separated parts of the city. New cases discovered and removed to North Brother Island were those of Mary A. Ilgen, twenty-three months old, of 15 West Ninety-eighth Street, and Louise Temple, fifty-three years old, of 237 West Tenth Street. Disinfectors and vaccinators were at once sent into the neighborhood.

The doctors find less trouble in getting people to submit to vaccination than they did during the first days of the outbreak. Dr. Blauvelt, Chief of the Bureau of Contagious Diseases, yesterday instructed men at work in a new district to try no coaxing or persuasion upon unwilling subjects, but if the offer was once refused, to pass on. The department keeps right on vaccinating at the rate of something more than 1,000 a day and supplying virus in hitherto unheard of quantities to physicians in private practice and to druggists.

There have been so far fifty-four cases taken to North Brother Island, and of these eight have been discharged as cured and three have died.

Smallpox Case in Jersey City.

Warrin Ferris, thirty-five years old, of 95 Larch Street, Jersey City, yesterday called on Dr. Charles F. Snyder of Summit and Pavonia Avenues. He said he was suffering from pains in the back. Dr. Snyder found that he was suffering from smallpox and that the disease was fairly well developed. Ferris was sent to the Emergency Hospital for Contagious Diseases, at Snake Hill, and the Health Board physicians at once vaccinated eighty-four persons living in the immediate vicinity of his home.

Lawyer Craig A. Marsh Injured.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Dec. 14.—Craig A. Marsh, Corporation Counsel of this city and one of the best-known lawyers in New Jersey, was badly hurt this evening. He was on his way home on his bicycle, and was riding down Park Avenue, when he came into collision with the wagon of Theodore Roundtree of New Market, who was driving in toward the centre of the city. Mr. Marsh was thrown and his scalp laid open. He was carried into the office of Dr. Endicott, who sewed up the wound.

CITY MUST PAY RODGERS

As a Contractor He Violated Prevailing Rate of Wages Law.

Appellate Court Decides Against City Because No Penalty Was Inserted for Violation of Contract.

The Appellate Division yesterday, by a divided court, reversed the decision made by Justice Leventritt last June, refusing a peremptory writ of mandamus to William J. Rodgers to compel the Controller to deliver to him a warrant on the City Chamberlain for payment of $2,863. This was the amount earned by Mr. Rodgers under his contract for regulating and grading One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street from Amsterdam Avenue to the Boulevard. The payments were to be made in monthly installments, 70 per cent. of the amount to be paid for the work and the materials furnished and delivered. Although the provisions of the labor law were incorporated in Rodgers' contract with the city, he failed to comply with the requirement that he pay the prevailing rate of wages. Payment to the amount due him was therefore refused.

The facts were not disputed, but Rodgers rested his right on the claim that the provision in the contract was unconstitutional and therefore should be disregarded. Justice Ingraham, giving the prevailing opinion, concurred in by Justices Patterson and Hatch, says the drawing of the warrant by the city official to discharge an indebtedness was a ministerial act which it was proper to enforce by mandamus. Justice Ingraham comes to the conclusion that no fact is alleged in the Controller's affidavit which would make the right to receive the payment of the money doubtful. If Rodgers had agreed in the contract that in the event of his violating the labor law he would not be entitled to receive any money from the city, notwithstanding the fact that he had in other respects complied with the contract on his part, he had no doubt, Justice Ingraham said, but that such contract would be binding upon him. Whether the insertion of such a provision was required by an express provision of law or not seemed to be immaterial.

Rodgers or any other contractor could agree to work for the city without any compensation, and if he agreed to do so upon the happening of any contingency, there would be no reason for the city to pay for what he agreed to do for nothing. The right of Rodgers to receive the money therefore depended upon the terms of his contract with the city. After reciting the provision whereby the contract was to be void unless the provisions of the labor law were complied with, Justice Ingraham says that as these provisions were inserted under a requirement of law, not for the benefit of the contractor, it was for the city to enforce forfeiture, if it was to be enforced.

It was the general rule in the construction of contracts that where there was a provision in a contract by which it was to become void because of the failure of a party to perform a covenant, it was only at the option of the party for whose benefit such a covenant was inserted that the contract became void. "* * * The right to avoid the contract or enforce this covenant must, therefore, be in the city as the contracting party for whose benefit and at whose request the covenant was inserted; and that being so, it was clear that the city could waive a violation of the agreement by the contractor, or at any rate the contract would not be avoided until the city had elected to avoid it, and gave notice to that effect to the contractor. As the city had failed to exercise its option to avoid the contract, it was still in force, and Rodgers as well as the city could enforce it. Justice Ingraham says in conclusion:

"I am satisfied that the Legislature has power to prescribe the form of contracts which shall be made by municipal corporation with those entering into contracts with it. No one is bound to enter into such a contract, or do work for a municipal corporation; but when he does, he must accept the terms of the contract as prescribed by law, and if he voluntarily makes a contract by which he is to receive pay only upon condition of his performing certain obligations, or doing the work that he agrees to do in a certain way, the contractor certainly cannot complain if the city refuses to pay except upon his compliance with the terms of his engagement. Where, however, the Legislature authorizes the municipal corporation to make a contract, under and by the terms of which the contractor is entitled to receive certain sums of money at certain stated periods, upon performing the work that he agrees to do, and the contractor performs the work which entitles him to a payment, no act of the Legislature can relieve the municipal corporation from the obligation to pay.

"The effect of a construction of this act as is asked for by counsel for the respondent would lead to the result, that, although a contractor had finished his work, and such work had been accepted by the city, if it should subsequently appear that the contractor had paid to one particular employe less than was subsequently ascertained to have been the prevailing rate of wages, then his whole right to receive from the city the amount that it was agreed should be paid, is swept away by force of this provision of the statute. I cannot believe that such was the intention of the Legislature, and I do believe that if it was intended, it was in violation of the Constitution and void."

Justice O'Brien gave a dissenting opinion, which was concurred in by Presiding Justice Van Brunt. Justice O'Brien says that where such serious questions of law, depending to some extent upon disputed questions of fact, are involved, they should be tried in an action rather than disposed of upon affidavits on a motion for a mandamus. Justice O'Brien adds that, in view of the express provision of the labor law, it would be seen that in handing the warrant over to Rodgers "there was something more involved than the doing of a merely ministerial act, and, as correctly urged by the respondent, 'It is rather a startling doctrine that a public officer can be compelled by mandamus to ignore or expressly violate the provisions of a statute.'

"Accepting as true, therefore, as we must on this appeal, the facts stated in the opposing affidavit, it would appear that the relator has not only been guilty of a breach of his contract, but that he has deliberately offended against the statute. And it is evident that his right under any form of remedy to obtain payment is not only disputed and denied by the defendant, but placed in serious doubt. Moreover, a disposition of the questions upon a summary application such as this would deprive the respondent of a proper legal advantage which he would have if the relator is compelled to resort to his remedy by action. Thus, it would be necessary for the relator to allege in the complaint, and, if the allegation were denied, to prove at the trial that he had faithfully performed all the terms and conditions of his contract with the city, including the provision therein by which he agreed to comply with the labor law. Upon his failure to make such proof, his right to the amount of the payment here sought would be seriously imperiled."

Justice O'Brien therefore comes to the conclusion that Rodgers should be confined to his remedy by action, to the end that all the questions, both of law and fact, may be formally and deliberately considered upon a trial, rather than here upon affidavits on a summary application for a mandamus.

LIMBURGER NOT A NUISANCE.

But Dissenting Judge Says a Pig Pen Gives Out Delicate Perfumery Compared with It.

Virginia Stuart Mackay Smith and others, who own the houses 413 and 415 West Seventeenth Street, in this city, failed on the trial of their action against Alexander Crawford and others to restrain the use of the adjoining premises, No. 411, for storing cheese, which it was claimed constituted a nuisance, and the Appellate Division yesterdal, by a divided vote, held that the decision below was right. The defendants, who were dealers in butter and cheese, stored many hundred pounds of these articles in their building. Testimony was given for the plaintiffs that the cheese gave off a disagreeable and offensive odor, which made the other houses uninhabitable. Witnesses for the defendants contradicted this. The Trial Justice decided that the business was "a lawful one, carried on in a lawful manner, and in a proper place." Justice McLaughlin, giving the opinion of the Appellate Division, Presiding Justice Van Brunt, and Justice O'Brien concurring, held that as there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court that the defendants did not maintain a nuisance, there should be an affirmance.

Justice Hatch, in a dissenting opinion, which was concurred in by Justice Ingraham, held that the evidence was abundantly sufficient to show that the business as conducted by the defendants constituted a nuisance. He referred to the fact that there were previously some stables, a blacksmith's shop, and a vinegar factory in the vicinity, but that did not destroy the locality as a residential neighborhood. "The invasion of the neighborhood by the defendants, and the introduction of their cheese business therein did, however, work a wondrous change," said the Judge. "And as I view this case, the working such change and the means which accomplished it created a nuisance. This fact, I think, appears from the testimony of the defendants. It is undisputed that, in addition to the American cheese which was stored by the defendants, they keep on hand from 500 to 5,000 pounds of Limburger cheese, about 30,000 pounds of Swiss cheese, together with considerable quantities of Brie and Roquefort cheese. It does not need proof to show that a strong, pungent, and penetrating odor issues from these compounds. The odor from Limburger cheese, when it is given fair opportunity to spread itself, is overwhelming, and unless the olfactory sense be educated to its liking, or deadened to its presence, it is about as offensive an odor as can greet the olfactory nerve of a human being. That premises are inhabitable in its continued exposed presence will not be generally believed, and when it is combined with the odoriferousness arising from the other cheese, we can readily see that a stench can be produced by the side of which the smell of hog pens and slaughter houses might be regarded as delicate perfumery.

"It is enough to say that language fails in description of such odor; and it is evident that the witnesses for the plaintiff were baffled in the attempt by lack of power to describe the overwhelming presence. * * * It needs no occult power to understand that a small quantity of Limburger cheese only is necessary to fill the atmosphere with smell. We have seen a single wagon containing a small quantity drive people from the street along which it passed, and we can readily understand that by constant use the wagons come to have a distinctive smell entirely their own."

ALDERMAN IN TIVOLI ROW.

Mr. McEneaney Protested Against Woman's Arrest and Wants to Give Bail.

There was a row at the notorious Tivoli, in West Thirty-fifth Street, shortly before midnight last night, in which Alderman E. F. McEnearney of the Twenty-sixth District, Detectives Binning and Boyer of the West Thirtieth Street Police Station, and Lou Baker, a woman well known in the neighborhood, were the principal actors.

According to the stories of witnesses McEneaney was sitting just inside the door of the place, where now "soft" drinks only are permitted to be sold, when the policemen seized the woman as she tried to enter. They have often arrested her before on charges of annoying pedestrians and picking pockets, they say, but she protested violently and the Alderman ran to her aid. "Let her alone," he said. "What are you doing?"

Binning said, "We are arresting her for coming in here without an escort."

"Well, she's with me. I'm her escort," said the Alderman.

Then the detectives started off with their prisoner, and before Sergt. Burns, at the station house, the Alderman produced his card and again insisted that she be liberated. He wanted to give bail for her, but Sergt. Burns told him that his card was not sufficient identification, and the Alderman left the station house, saying he would return later with friends.

BOY TRAMP'S ADVENTURES.

Says He Has Traveled 3,000 Miles in Less than a Year.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y., Dec. 14.—Fred Lewis is the name given by a bright boy who was to-day sent from this place to the House of Refuge on Randall's Island. The boy was arrested last night after he had been up to the house of Miss Helen Gould. His story is that he was left an orphan when three years old, and for the next five years was an inmate of a home in Washington, D. C. When eight years old he was bound out to a farmer in Georgia. He claims not to have been well treated, so he left the farmer, and during a little less than a year, he has, if his story be true, traveled some 8,000 miles.

He was in California a few months ago. While on his way East some one suggested that he see Miss Gould, and said she would obtain him a good home. The boy found his way to Tarrytown, and went to Miss Gould's residence. She was in New York last night, and when he found she was not at home the lad cried. He says he traveled by stealing and begging rides on trains.

ENTITLED TO CHANGE OF VENUE.

Plaintiffs in Suit Against Cornelius Van Ness Win a Point.

The Appellate Division in this city yesterday reversed the decision made at Special Term last July, which refused to change the place of trial of the suit brought by their guardian on behalf of Harriet and Marie Harmon, to have it declared that property valued at over $1,000,000, which had belonged in her lifetime to Emma L. Van Ness, was subject to the execution of certain secret trusts. Mrs. Van Ness, who died in Cornwall, Orange County, several years ago, leaving real estate there worth nearly $100,000 and a large amount of personal property in New York City, gave all her estate, real and personal, to her husband, Cornelius H. Van Ness, to do with it as he might deem proper, without limitation as to his use of it, for his own or another's benefit; what remained, if any, to be held in trust for others.

The defendants named in the action, besides Mr. Van Ness, are Emma Louise Van Ness Day and "Alice Wood, also known as Alice Van Ness." It is claimed that the last named became acquainted with Mr. Van Ness through a conspiracy, she pretending to have hurt herself in a bicycle accident, and, after a brief interval, induced Mr. Van Ness to marry her. In reversing the order below, the Appellate Division, Justice Hatch giving the opinion, unanimously holds that, under Section 982 of the code, the defendants were entitled to have the place of trial changed. By the terms of that section, if the action affected title to real estate, the venue was local, and it mattered not that personal property situated elsewhere might be affected.

COULD NOT BE DETAINED.

Alleged Absconder Martinez Discharged —Bankruptcy Petition Filed.

Domingo G. Martinez, calling himself José Antonio Martinez, who was arrested by Central Office detectives as he landed from the steamship Athos on its arrival from Costa Rica on Tuesday, was discharged yesterday by Magistrate Flammer. United States Consul Gruder at Panama cabled to Capt. McClusky to detain Martinez, as he was an absconder. No further advices having been received, the Magistrate decided that Martinez could not legally be detained longer.

A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against Martinez yesterday by Arnold C. Weil for three Panama creditors, viz., Moses D. Cardoze, $673; Morris Lindo, $889, and Ascoli Hermanos & Co., $1,003. It was stated that he has property here consisting of money and bills of exchange amounting to over $7,000. It was alleged that on Nov. 4 he concealed and removed his property from Panama, converted it into cash, sailed on the steamer Athos from Port Limon under the assumed name of José A. Martinez; that on Dec. 13 he transferred his property to Howe & Hummel by confession of judgment for $7,515 for legal services, and the confession of judgment was made to permit the concealment of the property from his creditors.

AND REVIEW OF BOOKS AND ART.

WITHDRAW THE TREATY.

It is time for the President seriously to consider whether he should not withdraw the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from further consideration by the Senate. He would spare himself a personal humiliation and in our judgment would promote the public welfare by that course.

The defeat of the treaty in the Senate, the mere refusal to ratify, would give the President no ground for complaint, certainly none for offense. The Senate is a part of the treaty-making power and has a constitutional right to hold its own opinions and differ with the President. It would be most unbecoming in a President of the United States to exhibit a spirit of petulance over a disagreement between himself and that body which the Constitution makes his adviser in the execution of treaties. This is not in the least an occasion of that nature. It is no mere divergence of view that separates the President and the Senate. It is a fundamental difference in purpose, a complete unlikeness of intention in respect not only to the treaty but to the canal project to which it relates. He may and must tolerate the independent action of the Senate. Propriety forbids him to make any inquiry as to its motives. He is bound to treat its decisions with official respect. But propriety does not require and the voice of duty forbids that he should permit the Senate to involve his Administration and the American people in a National disgrace.

It must now be clear that the proceedings in the Senate tend toward a result that no sensitive American could contemplate without shame. It is not at all the adoption of the Davis amendment by the large majority of 65 to 17 that arouses apprehension. That vote affords no measure of the forces that oppose the wish and policy of the President, for many of the President's friends and supporters voted with the majority. Of course he would abandon the treaty at once if he understood that the Senate stood 65 to 17 against him. The serious question involved for the President and the real spirit of the Senate are brought into view by the following flood of amendments for which the Davis amendment opened the way. There the secret but determined hostility that has baffled the President and the Secretary of State makes itself known; and for the lengths to which it will go and the embarrassments in which it may involve him the President cannot afford to become in any way responsible.

What will be the position of the President if the treaty is at length ratified and returned to him, not as it was drafted and approved by him, but distorted, deformed, wrenched away from the safe principles that guided the negotiation that gave it birth and so viciously transformed that it would be an offense to present it to the British Ambassador for transmission to his Government? The President would have no choice. He sends a treaty to the Senate and it comes back ratified, even if not in its original form. He cannot throw it into the White House waste-paper basket. It would be farcical for him to return it to the Senate with his own amendments. He could not very well do anything but pass it on to the British Ambassador, with a blush.

We hope he will spare himself that blush, the country that shame. It is not for the President even to hint at what others may bluntly assert. The really formidable, uncompromising opposition to the treaty is opposition to the Nicaragua Canal itself. To the north lie the transcontinental railroads, to the south lies the French Panama Canal enterprise. They have their interests to protect. The results of their attempts to protect them are visible at Washington. Re-enforcing their jobbery and adding to the difficulties of the Administration is the senseless, bawling, empty-headed element that demands an "exclusively American" canal, a canal for war, built by us, fortified by us, and to be closed at our pleasure. The two together have command of the Senate by controlling more than one-third of its vote. As they could have prevented ratification without the Davis amendment, Senators who have no part in their obstruction were compelled to vote with them for that. They will now go further. They have gone further already; and before the treaty ever reaches the hands of the President they will have gone so far that his own acceptance of it will be impossible unless he is prepared to humble himself to a degree forbidden by self-respect, so far that his request for its acceptance by Great Britain would be inexcusable.

It is far better that the canal should wait until the Senate is in a temper more appropriate to the consideration of a great National undertaking, or until public opinion, which is now somewhat indifferent, shall have evinced an interest that will prompt a more critical observation of the conduct of that body.

After the withdrawal of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty two courses would be open to the President. He might undertake the negotiation of another treaty on the same structural lines, but with changes intended to meet the honest and defensible objections of the Senate. He might even accept the Davis amendment, if that is essential, and there is reason to suppose that it would also be accepted by England. It would be a glaring inconsistency, but there might prove to be much less in it than its advocates imagine. There is not much chance that such a revision, if sent to the Senate when it shall be convened in special session after the 4th of March, would be ratified. It would then be open to the President to approach the representative of Great Britain on the subject of an agreement to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. If that stands in the way of the canal let us get rid of it. But in Heaven's name let us get rid of it by means recognized as orderly and honorable among civilized peoples, not by procedures that would be rejected as infamous in a deliberative council of Chinese Boxers.

SENATOR HANNA'S PITIFUL PLEA.

Senator HANNA of Ohio is easily chief of the advocates of the Ship Subsidy bill. Senator FRYE, its nominal author, a gentleman of considerable ability, is, in comparison with Mr. HANNA, languid and inert. Moreover, the interest he takes in the measure is not nearly so intense. It is the interest of a partisan; Mr. HANNA'S is that of a partisan and of a born and trained and, if he will pardon the term, a hardened trader. The Ohio Senator goes for his object with the sustained energy, the concentrated zeal, he manifests in his private business. We do not mean to imply that Mr. HANNA has the slightest financial interest in the subsidy scheme. We are not aware that he has. But he views it precisely as he would any large and difficult business enterprise, and pursues its accomplishment as he has been in the habit of following like matters of his own.

Naturally his temper, his manner of thought, and his methods of persuasion are rather those of the trader than of the statesman or the student of large politics. He ignores or belittles the facts that are against him, and where his case is weak he makes up for the weakness by the force and emphasis of his assertion. For instance, in his speech in the Senate on Thursday he made an indignant denial of the statement that the steamers of the American International Navigation Company would draw $304,000 a year each under the subsidy. When it was shown that these were the figures of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Commissioner of Navigation and the official champion of the scheme, Mr. HANNA still stuck to his denial. Finally he gave his own figures. They were $290,000. Of course, the difference was of no importance whatever, but it was enough to give Mr. HANNA an excuse for his impressive denial.

The Senator from Ohio dwelt with great earnestness on the splendid progress of the lake traffic in American vessels as compared with the decline of American shipping engaged in foreign trade. The implication is that the former has a monopoly conferred by law and the latter has not, and that if legislation gives aid to the latter it will advance as has the former. The inference is very weak. The American shipping on the lakes has no monopoly by legal enactment and most of it can have none. The progress it has made has been made under the pressure of intense competition for a rapidly increasing trade. The cost of building vessels and of running them is relatively as high for the lake trade as for ocean trade. What reason is there to suppose for an instant that subsidies from the Treasury would build up the ocean traffic because lake traffic has been built up without subsidies or any other legislative favor?

Mr. HANNA declares that in forty years our foreign commerce has increased fourfold, while our share in the carrying trade is less than one-third what it was in 1860. That is substantially true. Why is it? It is because other countries have done the carrying for us more cheaply than we could do it for ourselves. What is Mr. HANNA'S remedy? To take money from the pockets of the taxpayers to provide the profits for American ships which he says, they cannot now earn. That is public taxation for purely private advantage. Mr. HANNA may deny it as strenuously as he chooses. He cannot change the fact. He might as well ask that we pay him money to enable him to make a profit in carrying his ores to market instead of having them carried at the same rates by a transportation company. In each case the beneficiary would be richer but the taxpayers would be poorer. If he insists that we should be enriching our own citizens by profits that now go to foreigners, the answer is that the same end would be reached by letting our citizens buy the foreign-built ships. The only difference would be that in the latter case no money would be taken from the taxpayers.

But Mr. HANNA is scared about what would happen if the people who are now carrying our immense foreign commerce should get to fighting among themselves. Then, he says, our foreign commerce would be paralyzed. Not at all. We should have the same remedy always open to us. Repeal our absurd prohibition of an American register for vessels bought abroad. Then, if England and Germany, for example, should go to war with each other and begin to destroy each other's merchant ships, our people could promptly buy all the ships they needed and take over the trade of the belligerents. Why cannot so shrewd a business man as Mr. HANNA see these things? Chiefly, we fear, because he is blinded by a deeply rooted notion, born of his protectionist education, that a people must get aid in some way from its Government. No people on earth is less dependent on such aid than are the Americans. What they really need is only an open and fair field of competition.

PUT HIM OUT.

There has been since the 6th of last month much ridicule of the Democracy because its leaders at Kansas City did not perceive that free silver was an "obsolete idea" and a "past issue." I am certain, however, that the majority of that convention were then convinced of that fact and would have dropped the silver issue had it not been for the conduct of a majority of the delegates from New York under the lead of CROKER, who in that matter misrepresented the rank and file of the New York Democracy. I believe that had he permitted a minority report to be made by the Committee on Resolutions, the convention would have upheld it.—Mr. PERRY BELMONT in a letter to The Rochester Herald.

Is this not another first-rate reason why the Democrats of New York City should put this CROKER out? A leader who misrepresents his party, betrays his followers, and defeats the accomplishment of their wishes is abhorrent from every point of view. When he is permitted to continue in the leadership it is open to anybody to say without reproach or contradiction that although the leader may be false, the party is certainly foolish. Does any one but a fool go where he doesn't want to go when he is free to choose?

Mr. RICHARD CROKER is the official representative of every Democrat in New York, even of those that loathe him because no organization of Democrats in the city but the Croker organization has a word to say in conventions. There ought to be another, a Democratic organization formed to promote decent government and the supremacy of Democratic principles, not for plunder and pocket-stuffing.

The time is singularly propitious for forming a Democratic organization that will live—and go to conventions.

PRACTICAL TENEMENT-HOUSE REFORM.

The investigations of the Tenement House Commission seem to be leading to the conclusion that there is too much "shifting of official responsibility" under the present system, and that a tangible reform of the existing miserable conditions of tenement-house life can be secured only by taking all power relating to this class of buildings from the Health, Building, Fire, and Police Departments and vesting it in "a separate department, with a competent Commissioner and a well-selected corps of assistants."

That the present system works badly may be conceded without discussion. We are quite sure, however, that the remedy does not lie in the plan which is understood to be favored by the investigating commission. The responsibility should be centred, without doubt, but the further the oversight and regulation of tenement houses is separated from the Health Department the greater the opportunity offered for lax practices and a gradual lowering of the standards of construction and management. This is not because the Health Department is immaculate, but because mismanagement by it in this department of its work would be reflected in epidemics and an increased death rate, and there would be no escaping responsibility for the conditions which produced such results. It was a great wrong in this connection to take from the Health Department the control of lighting, ventilation, and plumbing in new buildings and vesting it in the Building Department. The reason for this change was that owners and builders of dwellings designed for a multiple tenancy wanted a wider latitude and better assurances of immunity in violating the law than the Board of Health would give them. They have had it for some ten years, with the result that there has been a distinct retrogression from the standards of 1885-90. What is known as the 1887 type of tenement house is so much better than thousands of those built since that date that it is not difficult to see why the Tammany influence was directed to the curtailment of the powers of the Health Board in holding speculative builders to the carrying out of approved plans and specifications.

In our judgment the most effective step which could be taken in the matter of tenement-house reform would be to restore to the Health Department the exclusive supervision and control of so much of it as relates to conditions affecting life and health. This would mean, practically, the re-enactment of Chapter 84, Laws of 1887, popularly known as the "Tenement House act." It was the best law we have had, or are ever likely to have. It fixed responsibility where it properly belonged, and if it had remained operative until the present time, it would have changed for the better all the remediable evils which are now under investigation. The co-operation of the Building, Fire, Police, and Street Cleaning Departments will be needed, and a new department attempting to work without such co-operation would be practically powerless for good.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Will you kindly correct the statement made by your Albany correspondent in this morning's TIMES, under the caption "Dr. MacDonald Seeks Office." The statement, so far as it relates to me, is absolutely untrue.

I voluntarily resigned the Presidency of the State Lunacy Commission in 1896, to resume private practice, after more than twenty-five years of continuous public service, and have no desire or intention of again taking up the burden I then laid down, and I have repeatedly so stated in response to the requests which have come to me recently from influential quarters to become a candidate for the office referred to.

DEBATE ON TAX REDUCTION

Strong Effort to Reduce Rate on Beer Fails Again.

1 CENT ON EXPRESS RECEIPTS

Clause Put Back in the Bill, with Proviso to Make the Companies Pay the Tax.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—The House today adjourned without disposing of more than half the War Revenue Reduction bill. General debate closed at 2 o'clock, after which the bill was opened to amendment under the five-minute rule. A determined effort was made to reduce the tax on beer below the committee rate of $1.60 a barrel, but the Ways and Means Committee overwhelmed the opposition.

The committee, however, sustained two signal defeats. In connection with the beer tax Mr. Payne offered an amendment in the language of the bill passed by the House last session, designed to abolish the use of small beer packages, one-sixth and one-eighth barrels, but it was defeated by 85 to 94, after charges that its purpose was to crush the small brewers.

Another defeat occurred in connection with the amendment offered by Henry C. Smith of Michigan. The bill abolished the one-cent stamp tax on express receipts and telegraph messages, but retained the tax on railroad and steamship freight receipts. Mr. Smith's amendment restored the tax on express receipts and altered the form of the section so as to compel the company instead of the shipper to pay the tax.

The amendment precipitated a lively debate, in the course of which Mr. Smith made a personal allusion to a United States Senator who is connected with one of the express companies. Mr. Payne vigorously fought the amendment, but it was carried.

Mr. Maddox, (Dem., Ga.,) the first speaker to-day, warned the Republicans that under their policy there would be as great a necessity for a standing war fund as for a standing army of 100,000 men. He prided himself on the fact that he was one of the men who had consistently opposed the Spanish war.

Mr. Otey, (Dem., Va.,) in a characteristic speech, made an appeal for a further reduction of the "oppressive tax on tobacco." He said that 980,000,000 people used tobacco, 400,000,000 used coffee, 350,000,000 used opium, and 100,000,000 used tea. Exact statistics on the users of whisky he said he did not have. But it was beyond controversy that tobacco was the solace of the world. Nothing, he said, staved off hunger and thirst like "a chew of tobacco."

Mr. Sulzer (Dem., N. Y.,) denounced the Republicans for failing to redeem the pledge made by the leaders when the War Revenue act was passed. They had then promised to repeal it as soon as the war was over. Mr. Sulzer was particularly insistent in demanding the total repeal of the additional tax upon beer. The brewing industry paid more tax than any other in the country. He said the onerous tax had driven many brewers out of business.

GENERAL DEBATE CLOSES.

Mr. Gaines (Dem., Tenn.,) concluded the general debate for his side of the House. Mr. Dalzell (Penn.) closed for the Republicans with a comprehensive speech of an hour. He reviewed the events leading up to the Spanish war and to the enactment of the War Revenue act, pointing out that the then-existing tariff and internal revenue laws provided ample revenues to meet expenditures in time of peace.

The War Revenue act was placed upon the statute books to meet war expenditures. It was not limited by time because war always brings with it a train of extraordinary expenditures which do not terminate with the close of actual hostilities. In reducing the amount to be raised from the act, he said, it was fair to ask questions were: How much revenue could be spared and which articles should be relieved of taxation? He proceeded to argue that a cut of $40,000,000 was the extreme limit consistent with safety, and that in making the reductions the Ways and Means Committee had made wise selections.

Those who sought the total repeal of the war taxes, he said, seemed to forget the extraordinary expenses that might have to be met in 1902. They made no provision for a River and Harbor bill, for big armor plate contracts, for subsidies for the merchant marine if the bill pending in the Senate should pass, for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and for the possibility that the Supreme Court might decide that the Constitution followed the flag, in which case the United States would have to refund all duties collected in the ports of Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines. Better a surplus, he said, than a deficit. In his opinion it were better not to have gone beyond the thirty-million-dollar cut recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

He said the ten-million-dollar reduction on beer had been made as a concession to members on the floor. It would be, he said, unsafe to reduce that tax another dollar. In conclusion, he said the Republican Party would continue from time to time so to adjust taxation as to impose the least burden upon the individual citizen and at the same time so guard and protect the Federal Treasury as to continue to make it the wonder and admiration of the world. This closed the general debate.

BEER MEN'S FIGHT IN VAIN.

The bill was read for amendment under the five-minute rule. As soon as the beer section had been reached half a dozen members were on the floor demanding recognition. Mr. Payne, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, from the committee offered an amendment to make the tax $1.60 per barrel flat instead of a discount of 20 per cent., as originally drawn.

Mr. Newlands (Silver, Nev.,) offered an amendment to reduce the tax to $1.20 per barrel. Mr. Bartholdt (Rep., Mo.,) sought to offer a further amendment to make it $1.50 per barrel, but was ruled out as being an amendment in the third degree. In support of his amendment Mr. Newlands argued that the tax on beer could be reduced and the taxes on the accumulated wealth of the country, for the first time placed under contribution, could be retained.

Mr. Payne opposed the Newlands amendment, which he said would make a reduction of $26,000,000 on beer, or a total reduction of $56,000,000. Such a reduction, he said, would necessarily create a deficit. The Newlands amendment was lost, 60 to 127.

Mr. Bartholdt then renewed his amendment, making the rate $1.50.

Mr. Allen (Dem., Miss.,) made a short and witty speech, closing, he said, his "great legislative career." He referred ironically to the need of keeping up taxation and spending more money. He raised a laugh by describing a walk in the fashionable quarter of Washington, and finding the palatial residences occupied by brewers. He opposed any further reduction of the beer tax.

Mr. Bartholdt and Mr. Fitzgerald (Dem., Mass.,) spoke in favor of the amendment, which was defeated by 60 to 139.

Mr. Sulzer charged that the Republicans had obtained a large campaign fund from the brewers upon a pledge to repeal the $1 additional upon beer. They had been false to their promise, and he predicted that the brewers would repudiate them at the next election.

Mr. Richardson (Dem., Tenn.,) said he had voted for the propositions to reduce the tax to $1.20 and to $1.50 per barrel. They had failed, and he would vote for the Payne amendment. But he protested that the refusal to give a further reduction was unjust to a great industry.

The Payne amendment fixing the tax at $1.60 per barrel was then adopted without division.

Mr. Stewart offered an amendment that unless the beer sold was made exclusively of malt and hops and so pronounced by Treasury Inspectors, the tax upon it should be $2 per barrel. Mr. Steel (Rep., Ind.,) made the point of order that the amendment was not germain, but Mr. Hepburn, (Rep., Iowa,) who was in the chair, overruled the point of order. Mr. Tawney (Rep., Minn.,) then moved to include barley in the ingredients of pure beer. This amendment was accepted by Mr. Stewart. The amendment was then defeated, 3 to 34.

Mr. Cortiss (Rep., Mich.,) offered an amendment to require the cancellation of stamps by perforation. He said the object of the amendment was to prevent fraud, and that it was desired by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The amendment was adopted, 123 to 23.

FRACTIONAL BARRELS RETAINED.

Mr. Payne then offered as an amendment the bill passed by the House at the last session fixing the size of beer packages. He said it abolished one-sixth and one-eighth barrels. The amendment was vigorously opposed by Mr. Fletcher, (Rep., Minn.,) who declared that it was a compromise by which the big brewers agreed to accept the reduction to $1.60 per barrel provided this amendment was placed in the bill. The amendment, he said, would crush out the small brewers.

Mr. Barney, (Rep., Wis.,) Mr. Davidson, (Rep., Wis.,) and Mr. Green (Rep., Penn.,) also opposed the amendment. Mr. Payne denied that the amendment was in the interest of the large brewers. The only people who opposed it, he said, were the coopers who had stock on hand and wanted to work it off. The amendment was defeated, 85 to 94.

Mr. Newlands offered an amendment providing that every person, corporation, or firm engaged in manufacture whose gross receipts exceed $500,000 shall pay an excise tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent. on such receipts above $500,000, and that such persons, corporations, &c., shall make true and accurate returns annually to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as in the case of refiners of sugar and petroleum.

The purpose of the tax, Mr. Newlands said, was to make the great trusts and combinations pay a portion of the war revenue. Further, it would compel them to furnish the statistical information upon which Congress could act in the future.

Mr. Payne, replying to Mr. Newlands, said the gentleman from Nevada had signed a report in favor of reducing taxation $70,000,000, and now his first proposition was to increase taxation. The amendment was lost, 90 to 119.

Mr. Kitchin (Dem., N. C.,) offered an amendment to reduce the tax on manufactured tobacco and snuff from 12 to 6 cents per pound, the tax before the war revenue act went into effect. Mr. Payne opposed the amendment, which, he said, would cost the Government $17,000,000 in revenue. The amendment was lost, 79 to 106.

TAX ON EXPRESS RECEIPTS.

H. C. Smith (Rep., Mich.,) offered a substitute for the section requiring railroad and steamboat companies to affix a one-cent stamp to every receipt, bill of lading, &c., using the language of the section in the present law relative to telephone messages and including in the substitute provision for a tax of 1 cent upon express receipts. Mr. Smith charged that the express companies had been unpatriotic in refusing to bear their share of the war taxes by compelling their customers to pay the tax. He made a direct reference to a Senator of the United States who is connected with one of the express companies, and declared that when the law was passed that Senator had advised the company not to pay the tax.

Mr. Payne replied that the express companies had found that they could not pay the enormous tax and live. It was different, he said, with railroads, which shipped in large quantities. The Ways and Means Committee had carefully considered the subject and had decided to abolish the tax on express receipts and telegraph messages. He expressed regret that Mr. Smith had seen fit to make a personal attack upon a Senator of the United States.

Mr. Swanson (Dem., Va.,) supported the amendment. He also referred to a particular express company, which, he thought, should be compelled to pay the tax if the tax was to be retained on railroad bills of lading.

Mr. Moody (Dem., Mass.,) declared that if the amendment prevailed, about 170 small express companies operating in New England would be driven out of business. The only equitable tax on express companies, he said, would be a tax on gross receipts.

Mr. McCall (Rep., Mass.,) also opposed the amendment. He explained in detail the operation of the local express companies in Massachusetts and the onerous effect of such an amendment.

Mr. Newlands offered an amendment to the amendment, providing that the section should not apply to express companies whose gross receipts did not exceed $100,000. This was lost, 82 to 106.

Mr. Smith's original amendment was then agreed to, 123 to 106. The text of the amendment is as follows:

EXPRESS AND FREIGHT.—It shall be the duty of every railroad or steamboat company, carrier, express company, or corporation or person whose occupation is to act as such, to make within the first fifteen days of each month a sworn statement to the Collector of Internal Revenue in each of their respective districts, stating the number of shipments received for carriage and transportation, whether in bulk or in boxes, bales, packages, bundles, or not so inclosed or included, for which any charges whatsoever have been made, and for each of such shipments received for carriage and transportation, the said railroad or steamboat company, carrier, express company, or corporation or person whose occupation it is to act as such shall pay a tax of 1 cent, also on bundles or packages of newspapers when inclosed in one general bundle at the time of shipment.

Without completing the bill the House at 5:25 P. M. adjourned.

VOLUNTEERS TO RETURN HOME.

Gen. MacArthur Ordered to Begin Sending Them Back—Anticipating Action by Congress.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Secretary Root and Adjt. Gen. Corbin appeared before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs today to discuss the Army Reorganization bill. They informed the committee that it would be impossible to send home all the volunteers in the Philippines in accordance with the schedule now planned unless the bill was passed without delay.

As an earnest of his good intentions in this matter, Mr. Root has ordered Gen. MacArthur to send home 9,000 of the volunteers at once, but not to send any more until there are regular regiments ready to replace them. Whether any more are sent home before next Summer will depend entirely upon the action of Congress. It was made plain that the bill ought to be passed before the holiday adjournment, Dec. 21, if the volunteers are to return home as originally planned.

Gen. Corbin estimated that it would take six months to raise the new army, and as the troops in the Philippines cannot be ordered home until regulars are ready to take their places, a delay until January in passing the bill would mean that at least some of the regiments would not get home until after the expiration of their enlistments. A longer delay would mean the detention of more regiments.

If the soldiers are held in the Philippines until the expiration of their enlistment they will be entitled to travel pay, and their transportation to the United States will be enormously expensive. In addition it will arouse public sentiment against the Administration and Congress among the friends of the volunteers, who have been led to expect that they will all be home before their terms of service expire. Very few of them, so far as can be learned, are expected to reenlist.

Dec. 11.

MacArthur, Manila:

Send volunteer convalescents to the capacity of the next transport returning and a volunteer regiment by transport following. As you report 69,000 now, the Secretary of War directs that you start home the volunteer regiments until the force is reduced to 60,000, the number fixed before beginning reinforcement by regulars. Will send you regular regiments to further relieve the volunteers.

CORBIN.

Manila, Dec. 13.

Adjutant General, Washington:

With reference to your telegram of the 11th, the Thirty-seventh Infantry Regiment, United States Volunteers, sails on transport Sheridan, Jan. 1, and the Eleventh Regiment, United States Volunteer Cavalry, Jan. 15. The movement will continue as directed till completed. The Thirty-sixth Regiment, United States Volunteer Infantry, is in the field and cannot leave at present.

Authority is requested to retain regular officers in the volunteer service whose regular organizations are here. Also, volunteer officers now assigned to special duty who so desire, with a view to muster out June 30. An important question of policy is involved, as the departure of volunteers almost renders it impossible to furnish officers for special duty, the necessities for which are increasing.

Transport Sherman leaves Dec. 15 with about 600 volunteer convalescents, and the transport Warren Dec. 22 with the same number. Any remaining will go on transport Sheridan Jan. 1.

MacARTHUR.

RETIREMENT WITH HIGHER RANK.

Secretary Root Urges Restoration of Army Bill Provision.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Secretary Root to-day sent a letter to Senator Hawley, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, urging that an effort be made to secure the adoption of the provision that any officer of the army now on the active list below the grade of Brigadier General, who served during the civil war, when retired be retired with the rank and pay of the next higher grade. Such a provision was contained in the House bill, but was stricken out.

Mr. Root inclosed a list of all the officers of the army who would be affected by the provision, showing that there are but 268 of all grades. A large proportion of them have already held and rendered service in the volunteer forces in the higher grade in which the provision would enable them to retire. Among them are many who have rendered conspicuous service as Major Generals and Brigadier Generals, and but for such a provision must now retire as Colonels or Lieutenant Colonels.

HOUSE REAPPORTIONMENT.

Bill Introduced by Mr. Hopkins and Resolution by Mr. Brosius.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Chairman Hopkins of the House Committee on Census introduced a bill to-day making the House membership 357 under the new apportionment, the same number as at present. Mr. Hopkins says his bill has no special significance, as coming from him as Chairman of the Census Committee, and will take its chances with other propositions.

The changes it makes are: Losses—One each, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, Virginia. Gains—One each in Louisiana, Minnesota, New Jersey, New York, and West Virginia; two in Texas.

Mr. Hopkins has called a meeting of the Census Committee for to-morrow morning to consider the question of reapportionment.

Representative Brosius (Rep., Penn.,) introduced a resolution for a Constitutional amendment designed to permanently fix the membership of the House of Representatives at 357, the present number. The proposed amendment recites that the membership of the House shall remain at 357; that when a new State is admitted it shall have one member, which shall be in addition to the 357 until the next reapportionment, when it shall return to that number, and that the electors of each State shall have the qualification of electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Mr. Brosius says the present representation is bulky enough, and that future changes should be confined to readjusting the ratio of State representation without increasing the total.

FOR BOUNTIES ON FARM PRODUCTS.

Senator Allen Proposes a Substitute for the Shipping Bill.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Senator Allen of Nebraska to-day proposed a substitute for the pending Ship Subsidy bill providing for the protection of agricultural staples and American ships in the foreign trade by authorizing the payment of bounties on exports of agricultural products of the United States.

The substitute provides for a bounty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat, 50 cents a barrel on wheat flour, 10 cents a bushel on rye, 50 cents a barrel on rye flour, 5 cents a bushel on corn, 7 cents per cental on corn, 1 cent a pound on cotton, 2 cents a pound on hops, and 2 cents a pound on tobacco.

It also directs the President to arrange for the abrogation of all treaties in contravention with the proposed legislation.

THE NEW HEBRIDES TROUBLE.

Cabinet Decides It Is Not Practicable to Send Warships There.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—About the only subject of popular interest discussed in the very short Cabinet meeting to-day was the application of the Rev. James F. Hill of Cannonsburg, Penn., for Governmental aid in protecting native Christians in the New Hebrides Islands. The subject was brought before the Cabinet by Secretary Long, to whom application had been made for a warship in behalf of the missionary interests.

The islands lie about 1,000 miles east of Australia, and just north of New Caledonia. They have been under a divided French and British protectorate. There was a general disposition on the part of the Cabinet officers to do everything proper and possible to meet the request of the missionary interests, but it was found that to send a warship to this part of the world would require a trip of about 4,000 miles from the nearest American station, and the Navy Department has no vessel now available for such service.

It also was reported that French and British gunboats patrol these seas, and doubtless would seek to prevent any such attack upon the native Christians as is said to have been planned.

Club Invites Mr. McKinley to New York

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Senator Depew, President of the Republican Club of New York, accompanied by E. A. Newell, William Brookfield, Arthur L. Merriam, and Henry Birrell, a committee from the club, waited on the President to-day and invited him to attend the annual banquet of the club in New York on Feb. 12, Lincoln's Birthday.

Federal Charters for Corporations.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14.—Representative McDermott of New Jersey to-day introduced a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that no State shall authorize or create corporations except those for banking and insurance, and that the Federal Congress shall pass general laws for the organization and control of corporations.

Faster Mails to Cuba.

Under a new arrangement mails for the Province of Santiago, Cuba, will be made up at the Philadelphia Post Office and forwarded to the island by steamships sailing from that city under the contract with the American Mail Steamship Company. It is believed in this way that considerable time will be saved over the practice of sending the mails from New York, as the Philadelphia ships deliver articles in Santiago in four days from that port and sail every week, while the ships of the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Company, sailing alternate Thursdays, require seven or eight days to make the trip.

Congressional Notes.

The Senate has agreed to the House resolution providing for a holiday recess of Congress from Dec. 21 to Jan. 3.

In the Senate yesterday President Pro Tem. Frye announced the appointment of Senators Hanna, (Ohio,) Spooner, (Wis.,) and Jones, (Ark.,) to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President.

The House Committee on Judiciary to-day has reported favorably bills establishing two United States judicial districts in Kentucky and West Virginia, respectively, and making the requisite provision for additional Judges.

Senator Vest of Missouri yesterday introduced a bill for the establishment in connection with the Department of Justice of a National bureau of criminal identification. The enactment of the measure into law is urged by the Police Superintendents of the United States.

MANILA'S LIQUOR LICENSE LAW.

Differences of Opinion in the Commission, but Measure Is Passed.

MANILA, Dec. 14.—The liquor license law has passed the Taft commission, but the latter is radically divided on its most distinctive features, namely, the banishment of saloons from the Escolta and several other crowded streets and plazas.

Commissioner Wright offered an amendment leaving the authority for the removal of saloons in the districts in question to the Provost Marshal. The amendment received only the votes of Commissioners Wright and Ide. An amendment by Judge Taft, excepting certain streets and adding others, was adopted, Commissioners Wright and Ide voting in the negative. On the passage of the bill Commissioner Ide voted "No" and Commissioner Wright voted with the majority. If there had been a seconder Commissioner Ide would have offered an amendment forbidding the sale of liquor to soldiers.

An amendment was added extending the time for the removal of saloons from three to six months, namely, to July. One of the sections, increasing the cost of licenses, goes into effect Jan. 1, when the licenses expire.

During the arguments of Commissioners Wright, Ide, Worcester, and Taft in favor of closing the saloons they cited the liquor laws of Tennessee and Massachusetts as effective precedents for confining the sale of liquor to prescribed localities.

They also said the native police are ineffective to cope with the situation when soldiers are visiting Manila and becoming hilarious.

SOUTHINGTON, Conn., Dec. 14.—News has reached here in the form of an official communication from Gen. MacArthur that Lina Skinner, a former Southington boy, has been sentenced to be shot in the Philippines on Christmas Day for sleeping at his post when on sentry duty. The young man is a member of the Forty-third United States Volunteers. His father, John P. Skinner, who is seventy-one years old, is nearly heartbroken, and has left for Washington to plead with President McKinley for his son's life. Young Skinner has a wife, who is now employed as a clerk in a New York dry goods store.

College Women Meet To-day.

There will be a meeting of college women this afternoon at 3:30 in the Women's University Club rooms, 23 West Forty-fourth Street. The project of a clubhouse is to be discussed and a large attendance of college women is expected.

HITS AT WOMEN'S CLUBS

Robert E. Erskine Says They Serve No Good Purpose.

Members of the League for Political Education Decide by Ballot that He Is Mistaken.

A large gathering of New York club women were treated to a discussion of their favorite topic, the woman's club, yesterday morning at a meeting of the League for Political Education. The question for debate, as regularly put, was: "That club life offers to woman a desirable opportunity for social and intellectual development."

On the affirmative were Mrs. J. Woolsey Shepard, President of the Society of New England Women; Mrs. St. John Gaffney, President of the International Council of Women, and J. C. Pumpelly. On the negative were Mrs. Henry M. Sanders, President of the League for Political Education, an organization to which men belong, and which devotes itself to the political education of the people; Mrs. Almon Hensley, President of the Society for the Study of Life, and Robert Erskine Ely of Cambridge. Mr. Ely struck straight out from the shoulder, to use a technical term not to be found in women's club papers, and the fall of a pin could have been heard while he was speaking.

"Club life for women has come to have a technical meaning," said Mr. Ely. "Organizations like the Red Cross Society, the patriotic societies, and the League for Political Education do not mean to come under the head of women's clubs. These organizations have a specific work, men may belong to them, and they would not be admitted to the federations of women's clubs. The woman's club is composed exclusively of women, and generally of one class of women. They are women who have no particular occupation, women who have a certain amount of leisure, and they are not the women who have distinguished themselves in art, literature, or philanthropy. Women of this latter class would not have the time or strength, if they had the inclination, to join such organizations.

"One reason why the club is not good for women is that it is not socially enlarging. They meet in it women with the same interests as themselves, and for the best kind of enlargement there should be a meeting of people of different stations in life and different points of view. From an intellectual standpoint the club is not beneficial. Its members are naturally not experts, and subjects for discussion are given out without regard to the writer. Naturally in the preparation of papers there must be a resort to elementary histories and the encyclopedia, and members of the club spend time in listening to matter of this kind when they might be reading the valuable essays in which our reviews of to-day abound.

"Another bad effect is that the club gives women a false standard. The women poets, artists, and philanthropists, the women we delight to honor, have not come from the women's clubs. Such women feel that they can spend their time better in other ways, or treat the club with silent contempt. There is a call for women to do a larger public service. There is work for them in the educational system, in domestic science, where drudgery may be reduced to a minimum, and much of the work should be done by machine, and there is the municipal housekeeping, which is only the domestic housekeeping on a larger scale. This is work for women, but they cannot do it if their time and strength are given to other things."

"Did he really mean what he said?" gasped Mrs. Henry A. Stimson, a prominent Sorosian, as Mr. Ely closed his remarks.

"Why, it wasn't true."

"Shall we vote on clubs as they are or as they might be?" asked Mrs. Frederick Nathan, President of the Consumers' League, and she did not vote at all when told to vote on clubs as they are.

The vote stood 25 in the affirmative and 18 in the negative.

PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

First of a Series of Entertainments at Cooper Institute.

A series of musical entertainments called People's Symphony Concerts were begun last night in the hall of Cooper Institute. The object of these entertainments is to provide good music for persons of small means, and the prices are very low. It is hoped, as was explained by the Rev. Dr. Eliphalet Potter in an introductory address, that the enterprise may eventually be endowed. The plan is a worthy one, and the audience which assembled last night and applauded the music was evidence in itself that the people are ready to do their share toward helping along the enterprise.

The concert last night was orchestral. The ensemble numbers were Bach's suite in D major, and Haydn's symphony in the same key. Between these two numbers Mr. Alfred E. Holmes, baritone, sang airs from Handel's "Judas Maccabeus" and "Semele," and Carl Grinauer, 'cellist, essayed Pergoleso's "Tre Giorno," (incorrectly announced on the programme,) and two dances by Leclair. The orchestration for the 'cello numbers was provided by Carl Venth, who was the concert master of the orchestra last night. The conductor was Mr. F. X. Arens.

It is a pity that so commendable an enterprise could not be launched amid general rejoicings, but the concert last night gave rise in the minds of the judicious to nothing but regrets. The orchestra played very roughly. Mr. Arens showed little skill or judgment in conducting, and Mr. Grinauer's 'cello playing was depreciative of the be

SEVERE BRITISH REVERSE

Gen. Clements's Troops Forced by Boers to Retire.

Reinforcements Sent to Clements, and Renewed Battle On at Last Report —Many Losses On Both Sides.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—Lord Kitchener reports that after severe fighting with Commandant Delarey at Nooitgedacht, Gen. Clements's force was compelled to retire. Delarey had a force of 2,500 men. Four British officers were killed. The other casualties were not reported.

"Pretoria, Dec. 13.

"Clements's force, at Nooitgedacht, on the Magaliesberg, was attacked at dawn to-day by Delarey, reinforced by Beyer's commando, from Warmbath, making a force estimated at 2,500. Though the first attack was repulsed, the Boers managed to get atop of the Magaliesberg, which was held by four companies of the Northumberland Fusilliers, and were thus able to command Clements's camp. He retired on Hekpoort, and took up a position on a hill in the centre of the valley.

"The casualties have not been completely reported, but the fighting was very severe, and I deeply regret that Col. Legge and Capts. MacBean, Murdoch, and Atkins were killed. Reinforcements have left here."

Lord Kitchener also reported that the Boers made an attack and were repulsed at Lichtenburg, and that Gen. Lemer was killed. Attacks upon Bethlehem and Vrede were also repulsed, the Boers losing ten killed and fourteen wounded. Vryheid was attacked on Dec. 11.

Sniping continued when the message was dispatched.

The scenes at the War Office yesterday recalled those witnessed in the early stages of the war. A constant stream of excited people filled the lobbies, all seeking details of the disaster. The absence of the names of any of the officers of the Northumberland Fusiliers in Gen. Kitchener's dispatch leads to the fear that the four companies of the Fusiliers mentioned are in the hands of the Boers.

The officials of the War Office evidently expect a heavy casualty list, but they are hopeful, from the fact that the dispatch does not mention the capture of the Northumberlands, that such a great catastrophe has been escaped.

The scene of the fight is ominously close to Pretoria. Nooitgedacht is only twenty-two miles distant from that city.

"Mr. Krüger and Dr. Leyds, who dined this (Friday) evening at the palace," says the correspondent of The Daily Mail at The Hague, "on the heartiness of the British disaster at Nooitgedacht, were quite unmoved. Mr. Krüger said he thought the British would break their necks on the Magalles Berg, and he reasserted his complete confidence in ultimately forcing Great Britain to initiate an acceptable settlement."

Orders were issued at Aldershot, Malta, and other military centres yesterday to dispatch all the available mounted infantry to South Africa.

JOHANNESBURG, Dec. 14.—The battle still continues in the hills a few miles from Krugersdorp. Gen. Clements has asked for reinforcements, and mounted men, under Gen. French, have already started.

There have been many casualties on both sides.

It is estimated that the Boers number 2,800.

STANDERTON, Transvaal, Dec. 13.—Gen. Louis Botha is reported to be twenty miles from here with 1,500 men and one gun. He has called a meeting of the burghers for Saturday.

THE LATE COL. LEGGE.

Col. the Hon. Henry Charles Legge, reported killed in the fighting at Nooitgedacht, was one of the best-known officers in South Africa. His death will be a severe shock to Queen Victoria, to whom he was Equerry-in-Waiting. He was born on Nov. 4, 1852, being the second son of the fifth Earl of Dartmouth, who married a daughter of the Earl of Aylesford. He was educated at Eton, and in 1872 entered the army as a subaltern of the Coldstream Guards. He became Adjutant of the First Battalion of that famous regiment in 1878. His distinguished service in the Soudan campaign of 1885 gained for him the brevet rank of Major.

In 1884 Col. Legge married Miss Amy Gwendoline Lambart, daughter of Gustavus and Lady Fanny Lambart of Beau Parc, Ireland. He leaves one son and one daughter. The latter is named Victoria Alexandrina, after the Queen, who stood sponsor for her, in 1889.

In 1889 Col. Legge was appointed a Groom-in-Waiting to the Queen, and in 1893 Equerry-in-Waiting. He was a member of the Royal Victorian Order and of the Guards' and Carlton Clubs.

KNOX ENGAGED WITH DE WET.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—It is reported that Gen. Knox, co-operating with the British column at Reddersburg, has stopped Gen. De Wet and that a battle is proceeding.

The report adds that many of De Wet's followers have been captured.

BOERS THREATEN KOMATIPOORT.

LORENZO MARQUES, Dec. 14.—The British troops at Komatipoort are standing to arms in the expectancy of an attack by a Boer force of 1,500, which is in that vicinity. It is believed to be the intention of this force to make a dash upon the town.

The situation is regarded as serious.

A force of 150 infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and two guns was dispatched to the frontier this morning.

STATEMENT BY MR. COCKRAN.

Says He Has Not Changed His Views on the Boer War.

W. Bourke Cockran gave out a statement yesterday in reply to reports that he had changed his views on the Boer war and that his attendance at the Winston Churchill lecture was a public evidence of such a change. Mr. Cockran's statement is as follows:

"I cannot understand how anybody can regard my attendance at Mr. Churchill's lecture as an evidence of sympathy with the British invasion of the Transvaal. I certainly have not changed in the slightest degree my belief that the South African war is the greatest violation of justice attempted by any civilized nation since the partition of Poland. I could, however, have little confidence in the soundness of my own opinion on any disputed question if I were reluctant to hear the very strongest words that could be said in support of the opposite view.

"My opinion in this instance has been founded almost entirely upon the Blue Books published by the English Government, and if Mr. Chamberlain or Sir Alfred Milner undertook to discuss the question before an American audience, I would be among the most eager to hear him."

The Elks to Get a Church.

A meeting of the congregation of the First Congregational Church of Jersey City was held last night to consider the proposition to sell the down-town church, known as the Tabernacle, to Jersey City Lodge, No. 211, B. P. O. Elks. The vote sustained the sale by 219 to 70.

It was said last night at the residence of Oswald Ottendorfer, in Central Park South, that his condition was not as favorable as on Thursday.

MINISTERS IN BUSINESS.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—In the House of Lords yesterday the Earl of Hardwicke replied to Lord Rosebery's criticism in the House at the reassembling of Parliament on Dec. 7. Lord Rosebery referred to Lord Hardwicke, now Under Secretary of State for India, as being a member of a firm of stockbrokers.

Lord Hardwicke said that when he was offered the appointment he explained to Lord Salisbury and to Lord George Hamilton, the Secretary of State for India, that though he would relinquish active business he could not sever his connection with his firm.

Ten years ago, Lord Hardwicke continued, he was left without a shilling, and he could not afford to sever his connection with the city, which had furnished him a livelihood, for the sake of a few years in office. While in office, however, he would not enter the Stock Exchange, and he would not take up his new duties until he retired from active business in January.

Lord Hardwicke then pointed out that Lord Rosebery's principle was not carried out by Mr. Gladstone, and he said that Lord Rosebery himself was a member of the Cabinet to which Mr. Gladstone appointed a gentleman who was a partner in a firm of cotton brokers as Under Secretary of State for India, and Bertram Currie, a banker in active business, as Finance Member of the Indian Council. At that very time the fall in the price of silver and cotton were the two principal matters the India Office had to deal with.

After Lord Rosebery had reasserted the correctness of his principle, Lord Salisbury took exception to the soundness of Lord Rosebery's views. He said Lord Rosebery had raised a similar claptrap cry against stock brokers as he had raised against Directors, who were not more guilty of commercial sin than others of the mercantile community. If no one connected with commercial business was capable of filling a Government post not only was a stigma cast upon an honorable profession, but the circle of men available for the service of their Queen would be seriously diminished. The field for the selection of Ministers was small. The doctrine invented by Lord Rosebery was of no value for any practical purpose.

War Loan Bill Passed.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—In the House of Commons yesterday the War Loan bill passed the committee stage.

REPORTED DEAL IN MARBLE.

Senator Proctor, It Is Said, Is About to Buy the Carrara Quarries in Italy for $10,000,000.

ROME, Dec. 14.—Representatives of Senator Redfield Proctor of Vermont arrived at Leghorn this week, and are said to be closing up a deal through Gastaldi & Co. of Genoa, representing Alexander Konta, by which Senator Proctor is to take over the entire Carrara quarries. It is asserted that these, with his Vermont possessions, will give the Senator practical control of a large proportion of the marble output of the world.

The Carrara quarries heretofore have been controlled by a large number of small owners, who have been constantly warring with each other. The proposed consolidation, it is believed, would result not only in largely increasing the output of these important quarries, but would reduce largely the cost of production.

Negotiations have been in progress in London, but it is understood that Senator Proctor quickly took up the scheme. The price is understood to approximate $10,000,000.

THE ETRURIA IN A GALE.

Liner, Unable to Land Passengers at Queenstown, Goes On to Liverpool.

QUEENSTOWN, Dec. 14.—The Cunard Line steamer Etruria, Capt. McKay, which arrived off here from New York at midnight to-night, was forced to proceed to Liverpool without communicating with the shore or landing any of her passengers, owing to the heavy gale which prevailed at that time.

WILLIAMS ADMITTED TO BAIL.

Charged with Attempted Bribery During the Campaign.

Capt. Alexander S. Williams, Jr., of the Seventy-first Regiment, and a nephew of ex-Police Inspector Alexander S. Williams, was released in $1,000 bail in Long Island City yesterday afternoon, having been arrested on a charge of attempted bribery.

It is charged that he offered Frederick W. Bothmer a delegate to the Democratic Convention for Queens Oct. 9, $100 to refrain from voting for any other person than John H. Sutphin for the office of Court Clerk. Capt. Williams denied the charge.

Lord O'Hagan Dead.

LONDON, Dec. 14.—Lord O'Hagan is dead.

Thomas Towneley O'Hagan, second Baron O'Hagan, was born in 1878, and succeeded his father, the first Lord, who was twice Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, in 1885. He was educated at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, and afterward entered the army as a subaltern in the Grenadier Guards, of which regiment he was a Lieutenant at the time of his death. The title descends to the late Peer's brother, the Hon. Maurice Herbert Ignatius Towneley O'Hagan, who will come of age in fifteen months.

Famous Castle Near Mons Burned.

BRUSSELS, Dec. 14.—The Château Bel Oeil, near Mons, the castle and Summer residence of the Prince of Ligne, dating from 1146, has been destroyed by fire. The paintings and most of the principal works of art which it contained were saved. The Princess of Ligne noticed an odor of burning wood last evening, and told her father of it, but he paid no attention to the matter. The château was burned during the night.

Communication.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Sir: In your review in yesterday morning's paper of the lecture by Mr. Churchill the night before you inform us that in an interview between your reporter and Mr. Churchill he stated that he had never written any letter in which he stated, referring to the Boers: "We had a 'good bag' to-day, ten killed, seventeen wounded." Now, Richard Harding Davis, one of the Reception Committee to introduce Mr. Churchill, who also attended the lecture, has himself written a book on the campaign in South Africa entitled "With Both Armies." On Pages 129 and 130 he says: I quote verbatim: "The charge of the Fifth Lancers as described by an officer of the regiment in a letter home as 'good pig sticking' consisted, so the Boers say, of the Lancers stabbing the wounded German and Dutch volunteers as they lay on the ground waiting for the ambulances as they raised their hands for mercy. One Swiss hotel waiter was brought in here from Elandslaagte with a bullet wound in the knee, which had brought him to the ground, and seventeen lance wounds in his body, which he had received from apparently each Tommy who rode over him. But so far as I can learn what hurt the Boers more than the stabbing of the wounded men on the ground is that one unfortunate line in the English officer's letter who described the charge as good 'pig sticking.' It is the ill-breeding and useless callousness and brutality of that remark which the Boers cannot understand. But his phrase was with rare lack of taste copied widely in all the English newspapers. The fact that this was done shows in itself how since the war the taste and judgment of many people in England has fallen below the old standard, and has become hardened and distorted. We see it also in the fact that in one of his letters Mr. Kipling speaks jauntily of 'A good killing,' and Winston Churchill, than whom there is no one among English correspondents for whom I entertain a higher regard, writes: 'We had a good bag to-day, ten killed, seventeen wounded.' The question of veracity is between Mr. Davis and Mr. Churchill.

WOULD OUST MR. COOGAN

VOTED AT SOUTHAMPTON, L. I.

This Fact, Which Is Admitted, Declared to be a Violation of the Charter—Salary May Be Withheld.

President James J. Coogan's right to hold the office of President of the Borough of Manhattan has been challenged. A lawyer has written to Controller Coler stating that President Coogan voted at the last election at Southampton, L. I., and by this act he forfeited his right to hold his five-thousand-dollar job in the City Hall, Borough of Manhattan.

President Coogan acknowledges that he voted at Southampton, but contends that he has not forfeited his office and will continue to draw his salary until ousted by the courts. The wording of the section of the charter is explicit. Lawyer Joseph Fitch in his letter to Controller Coler yesterday said that the Finance Department would be held liable for any further payments of salary to President Coogan because he was not legally in office. Section 382 of the charter prescribed that "There shall be a President of each borough, who must be a resident thereof at the time of his election and remain a resident thereof throughout his term of office."

A clause in this section reads:

Any vacancy in the office of President caused by removal from the borough or otherwise, shall be filled for the unexpired term by an election to such vacancy made by a majority vote of all members of the Municipal Assembly then in offices representing said borough, and in case of such vacancy it shall be the duty of the Mayor forthwith to call such members in session for such an election and to preside thereat. A President of the borough may be removed by the Mayor on charges, subject to the approval of the Governor of the State of New York.

President Coogan made public the letter from Lawyer Fitch, after Secretary Baker, who represented the Finance Department in the absence of Controller Coler in Boston, made it plain that the matter could not be kept a secret.

President Coogan said:

"Yes, I voted in Southampton on Nov. 6 last. I have a mother-in-law eighty-one years of age who was very ill, and I wanted to be near her all the time. That is why I acquired a voting residence in Southampton."

"Your mother-in-law is still alive?" he was asked.

"Yes, Sir," was the reply.

"Where is your residence now?"

"I live at 599 Fifth Avenue. That is my only residence, and that is in the City of New York, Borough of Manhattan."

"Do you intend to demand your December salary from Controller Coler?"

"I don't need the money," he said.

"What will you do if Controller Coler holds up your salary?"

"I will do nothing. I don't need the salary."

President Coogan said he would let other people take the initiative in ousting him from office and that he intended to hold on to the job as long as he could. He said that the estate of William Lynch, which he is manager, paid the city $36,000 in taxes every year.

"Do you pay personal taxes in New York?" was asked.

President Coogan brought out a bunch of tax bills. He did not open them. He said:

"I pay taxes here."

At the Department of Taxes and Assessments it was found that President Coogan has not paid any personal taxes for two years. When this was told to President Coogan, he said:

"Yes, I swore off my personal taxes in 1898. I did not swear off the taxes on the ground of my being a non-resident, but on the ground that the equity I held in property was offset by mortgages."

Controller Coler will return from Boston to-day and the question will then be decided whether President Coogan will receive pay for December. It was said yesterday that in view of the notice served on Controller Coler he would be compelled to withhold President Coogan's salary until the matter of his right to the office was decided by the courts.

INSURANCE ORDER FAILS.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., Dec. 14.—To-day Attorney General Taylor, Auditor of State Hart, and Supreme Recorder T. B. Linn of the Order of Chosen Friends, with their attorneys, appeared in the Superior Court, where the State asked for a receiver for the Chosen Friends, alleging that the order is insolvent. Supreme Recorder Linn admitted that the facts set out in the application are true. The State then asked that Thomas Yount Chief Secretary in Linn's office, be named as receiver.

The Court refused to name Yount, because he is a certificate holder in the order. It appointed Cyrus J. Clark of this city as receiver. Bond was fixed at $5,000.

The filing of the suit will affect thirty States of the Union, as the association has been authorized to do business in that number. In the application for the receivership, which is a voluminous document, the fact is set out that the association is insolvent and unable to meet the death claims now outstanding. These claims aggregate about $300,000, and come to light through an examination made by George U. Bingham, expert of the Indiana Insurance Department, last Wednesday.

One of the primary causes of the failure of the organization was the great loss sustained in the Galveston disaster. The claims arising out of the death of members in the ill-fated city aggregated about $80,000. The examination also revealed that an official had defaulted to the amount of about $30,000. The order is secured by a bond in one of the bonding companies.

H. H. Morse of 10 Wall Street, New York, is the Supreme Councilor of the order. It was stated yesterday at the office of Mr. Morse that the dispatch from Indianapolis was the first intelligence they had had of the application for receivership. The officer mentioned as in default was William B. Wilson, Supreme Treasurer, of Newark, N. J. Mr. Wilson died of cerebral apoplexy on the 31st of October, after an illness of a few weeks. He joined the order when it was in its infancy, and was sent to Newark to manage the interests in that city, Jersey City, Paterson, and Elizabeth. He held many offices in the order.

It was also stated in Mr. Morse's office that the order was established May 28, 1879, in Indianapolis, and admitted both men and women as members. It insured in four grades—A, $500; B, $1,000; C, $2,000; D, $3,000—and was an assessment company. It has paid up to Oct. 31, 1900, in benefits (7,027 deaths) $12,638,189.50, disabilities (912) $583,630, and old age disabilities (342) $440,330.75; total, $13,767,150.25.

WILLIAM C. TEASDALE WEDS.

Octogenarian Rose Grower's Homestead Now Has a Mistress.

Lights glimmering through the windows of the old Teasdale homestead, at 1,188 Fulton Avenue, in the Borough of the Bronx, where all was formerly dark at night, recently started the neighbors to gossip, and led to the discovery that William C. Teasdale, the aged master of the house, had taken a wife more than a month ago, without telling them anything about it. Mr. Teasdale is eight years old, and the woman of his choice was Mrs. Sara Ann Tremper of 1,077 Washington Avenue, a good-looking widow, fifty-five years old. They were married by the Rev. Victor C. Smith, rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Holy Faith, in East One Hundred and Sixty-sixth Street, on Nov. 12, the ceremony being performed in the rectory immediately adjoining the church. The names of the rector's wife and of M. J. Wells appear as the witnesses.

This is Mr. Teasdale's third marriage and his wife's second. He was born in England, but came to this country while a young man. Mr. Teasdale has occupied the homestead where he is now spending his honeymoon for the last sixty-five years. He prospered as a hatter, and retired from business long ago, and for the last fifteen years has devoted himself to the cultivation of roses, until in the Summertime the rose garden upon his property is one of the sights of the borough. His flowers have drawn many prizes at floral exhibitions, for he raises more than seventy-five varieties, and one of them, the Teasdale Beauty, has achieved considerably more than local renown.

Hugh K. Norman's Will Filed.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWPORT, Dec. 14.—The will of Hugh K. Norman was filed in the Probate Court this morning. It is dated Nov. 16, 1888. Mr. Norman leaves all his estate to his wife, Dorothy Prindall Norman, and names George Norman Weaver and George H. Norman as executors. Both of these decline to serve, and the widow petitions that she be appointed administratrix. The will has attracted much attention here, as Mrs. Norman left her husband and sued him for divorce. She and the Norman family, however, are on good terms, and it is stated that there will be no contest.

WANTED RED-HAIRED GIRLS.

Capt. C. H. Riggs Secures Three Employes by Advertising.

The following advertisement, which was published yesterday, caused considerable excitement in the vicinity of University Place and Ninth Street:

WANTED.—Stenographer; also girls, other positions; must have red hair.

The young women who answered it were all making for the building at 41 University Place, and their advent was noted from the windows of many of the cafés and hotels near by. The heads of hair that came in reply to the advertisement ranged in hue from a ruddy gold to the deepest auburn, and they arrived in such numbers as to disprove, for the nonce, the more or less generally accepted adage about the appearance of white horses.

Capt. C. R. Riggs was the man who wanted the red-haired girls, and he got more than he could find places for. He dresses like Buffalo Bill and sells Indian curios.

"I've been trying to get a red-haired stenographer for two months," the Captain said, "and I've had a hard time to do it, though there seems to be plenty of them for other kinds of work."

Asked why he favored them he said: "I think they are brighter. They take hold better, and I like to see them about me, too."

He soon chose a stenographer from among his callers, who were looked upon with disdainful glances by a black-haired young woman, who was tapping a typewriter in the corner of the office, and then put two others to work in different capacities. He next announced that he had filled all the important vacancies, and only had places for a few more little girls who would work for $3 a week.

DEATH LIST OF A DAY.

George Lord Day.

George Lord Day, a member of the old New England family of that name, died yesterday morning at a private hospital in this city of the results of an operation performed two days ago. Mr. Day was born in this city in 1860. His father was Henry Day, a lawyer of high standing, and his mother was Phoebe Lord Day, a daughter of Daniel Lord, founder of the well-known law firm of Lord, Day & Lord. Mr. Day was a graduate of Princeton and delivered the Latin salutatory address of the class of '82. Later he studied law and entered his father's firm, of which he became a partner soon afterward.

The firm had charge of many large estates, among them that of the Astors. When Mr. Day's father died he was succeeded by his son as trustee under the will of William Astor. Mr. Day was an ardent fox hunter, and it was in November, 1894, while engaged in a chase of the Meadow Brook Hunt Club in Long Island, that he received injuries which very nearly cost his life at the time. He was trying to take an unusually high fence when his horse fell, throwing him heavily. Although he finally recovered, he found it necessary to retire from the practice of his profession.

After that he became interested in yachting. He had built for himself the schooner yacht Endymion, with which in July last he broke the yacht record for the run from Sandy Hook to the Needles, making the trip in 13 days and 20 hours. At the opening of the Spanish war, Mr. Day was on his yacht near Lisbon, Portugal, and he had to use considerable strategy to escape capture by the Spaniards.

In 1896, in England, Mr. Day married a young Frenchwoman, Adèle Mittant, who survives him. His marriage caused quite a sensation at the time, and estranged him from his family, who objected to it.

Mr. Day was a member of the Lawyers', Manhattan, University, Racquet, Princeton, Union, New York Athletic, Meadow Brook Hunt, and New York Yacht Clubs, and of the Bar Association and the Down Town Association.

DINNER TO PROF. WOODBERRY.

A dinner was given to Prof. George Edward Woodberry, head of the department of comparative literature of Columbia University, last night at Sherry's by the present and former students in his classes. The occasion of the dinner was to celebrate the tenth year of Prof. Woodberry's connection with Columbia. About 130 students sat down to the banquet tables.

Joseph M. Proskauer of the class of '90 was the toastmaster. In stating the purpose of the assemblage, Mr. Proskauer said that it would be impossible to define the limits of Prof. Woodberry's influence on the students of Columbia. He presented Prof. Woodberry with a book of vellum containing tributes paid to him by Columbia men at different times. Prof. Woodberry in his response said that he had formed many ties in Columbia, but what bound him most to the college was the responsive students.

Tributes to Prof. Woodberry as a man and a teacher were paid by Seth Low, J. H. Van Amringe, Hamilton Wright Mable, Stephen H. Keating, T. Williams Jackson, Harry Thurston Peck, John Kendrick Bangs, and Lindsay Swift.

HEIR TO $40,000 MISSING.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 14.—For five years the estate of John Christie, amounting to $100,000 or more, has remained undivided because one of the heirs cannot be found. The missing man, who is the heir to $40,000 from the estate, is John Christie, Jr., and his brother, James A. Christie, a well-known politician and business man of this city, is now searching and advertising for him throughout the country.

When the elder Christie died twenty years ago he left no will, and the youngest of his five children, two sons and three daughters, did not become of legal age until five years ago. In the meantime the oldest son, John, had developed a roving disposition, and at the time the estate was to be divided could not be found.

If John Christie is not heard from shortly the other heirs will ask the courts to declare him legally dead, and proceed to divide the $100,000.

FIRE DESTROYED RARE FLOWERS.

John Crosby Brown's Orange Mountain Greenhouses Burned.

Special to The New York Times.

ORANGE, N. J., Dec. 14.—Rare orchids, palms, and chrysanthemums to the value of several thousand dollars were destroyed in a fire in the big greenhouses of J. Crosby Brown, the banker, at his residence on top of the Orange Mountain, at 1 o'clock this morning. The blaze, which is supposed to have been caused by overheated pipes, was discovered by Policeman Tims, and it was due to the alarm given by him that the house and other buildings were not destroyed. When the firemen arrived they did not have water pressure enough to do more than keep the fire from spreading to other buildings on the place.

Mr. Brown and his family are at their Winter residence in New York. The banker is an enthusiastic collector and floriculturist, and his conservatories contained specimens of some of the finest orchids and chrysanthemums known.

J., Dec. 14.—Charles James, the alleged brother of Jesse James, the noted outlaw, was acquitted to-day, in the Somerset courts, of stealing an engine from Charles Van Nostrand's steam launch at East Millstone. James Donnelly, who was arrested with him, confessed that he stole the engine himself and that James had nothing to do with it. Donnelly was sentenced by Judge Schenck to one year at hard labor in State Prison.

Lovers of decorative art are cordially invited. As each case is an original creation, the number of these instruments is necessarily limited. Steinway & Sons beg to call the attention of their customers to the considerable length of time necessary for the manufacture of art-piano-cases to match particular pieces of furniture or after original designs, and respectfully urge the need of ample allowance when placing orders for instruments required for special occasions.

RELIGIOUS NEWS AND VIEWS

New York Methodists Will Try to Raise $1,250,000.

Local Methodists have organized for a big money campaign. Some trouble has been had in harmonizing all elements, but it has been done. Unlike the plan of American Methodism as a whole, local Methodists will set themselves no stint. They will merely start out and get all they can. Two years will be needed to complete the task.

A joint committee consists of Bishop Andrews, Chairman; the Rev. Dr. C. W. Millard, Presiding Elder; the Rev. Dr. Joseph Pullman, Presiding Elder; the Rev. Dr. F. M. North, and the Messrs. J. M. Cornell, S. W. Bowne, Anderson Fowler, A. H. De Haven, and A. S. Newman. These gentlemen represent the New York, the New York East, the City Mission, and all other interests, and it is purposed to take into the movement the churches east of Third Avenue which belong in the New York East Conference. The New York district extends as far north as Peekskill.

The debts of all Methodist churches within the limits named amount to about $700,000. An effort is to be made to pay all of these off. But conference claimants, St. Christopher's Home, and the New York Deaconess Home and Training School are to come in. The last named are to be endowed, if the money can be raised.

There have been named also Public Meetings, Literature, and Spiritual Work Committees. The last named is intended to work along the lines of the commission at the head of which is Bishop Thoburn, and it aims at getting new members into the churches. The plan of work is to hold public meetings, to circulate literature, to enter into a comprehensive plan of pulpit exchanges, and by conferences with official boards of all churches to see that every Methodist in New York gives something. About $1,250,000 will be needed to do all that is in mind. Speaking of the undertaking, Presiding Elder Millard said yesterday:

"New York Methodists have been said to be behind some others in the country in entering upon the Twentieth Century Thank Offering movement, but exceptional conditions are to be found here, and it may be we shall make progress fast enough once we are started to overtake our faster rivals. Three conferences come into New York, and so a division of the field is difficult."

While no definite announcement is likely to be made until after Easter, it is pretty well settled already that the new rector of St. Thomas's Episcopal Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-third Street, to succeed the late Rev. Dr. John Wesley Brown, will be the Rev. Dr. Alexander Mackay-Smith, the rector of St. John's Church, Washington. Such selection is held by all to be the logical one. The Rev. Dr. Mackay-Smith was assistant at St. Thomas's for six years, and married in that congregation.

He is well known in this city, having been Archdeacon of New York for six years, quitting that position to go to St. John's, at which church he has been eminently successful. He is a native of New Haven, and entered the ministry in 1876. His first work was in Grace Church, South Boston, coming from there to St. Thomas's.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LESSON.

Copyright, 1900, by John R. Whitney.

SUBJECT.—Parable of the Pounds.—Luke, xix., 11-27.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Every one of us shall give account of himself to God.—Rom., xiv., 12.

That all men are invited "to eat bread in the kingdom of God" was set forth by our Lord in two parables—"The Great Supper," (Luke, xiv., 15-34,) and "The Marriage of the King's Son," (Matt., xxii., 1-14.) That all who belong to that kingdom will be rewarded. He also set forth by two parables—that of "The Pounds" and that of "The Talents," (Matt., xxv., 14-50.) The acceptance of the Gospel invitation—"Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest"—marks the entrance into that kingdom. The distribution of the rewards will be made when "all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." (2 Cor., v., 10.)

The conditions of the invitation—and the way in which it is received—we have already considered. The character and the conditions of the rewards now come before us. As the two parables setting forth the invitation, emphasized—the one, the relation of those invited to the invitation—and the other, their relation to him who invited them—so these concerning the rewards declare that they are determined—the one by the relation of the servants to their lord—and the other by their personal abilities. In both cases, however, the servants did not labor for the purpose of securing the rewards, any more than those who were invited labored to secure their invitations. Both the invitations and the rewards were free—unexpected—and gracious.

Like the parables of "The Great Supper" and "The Marriage of the King's Son," the two parables of "The Pounds" and of "The Talents" are, in many respects, very similar—so much so that some have considered them as one. A slight examination, however, shows that they were two entirely distinct parables, spoken under very different circumstances, for very different purposes, to very different audiences, in different places, and at times separated from each other by an interval of at least several days. The parable of "The Talents" will come before us hereafter. That of "The Pounds" alone demands our attention now.

It was spoken in Jericho, and probably at the house of Zaccheus. It was not addressed especially to him, however, but to the multitude at his door. This multitude was made up of dwellers in Jericho, and of those who had come into the city with Jesus. These strangers were at first a small band of devout Jews who had started from beyond Galilee, in obedience to the law of Moses, (Deuteronomy, xvi., 16,) to attend the Passover Feast. By accessions from every town through which they passed this little company had become a large caravan. Jesus and His apostles had been traveling with it, probably, for several days. It was now about to set out on the last stage of its journey to the Holy City, which was only a few hours distant.

A TIME OF GREAT EXPECTATION.

It was a time of great expectations with the apostles. When they should reach Jerusalem they fully believed that Jesus would proclaim Himself—King—and then all of their hopes would be realized. Although He had time and again—as we have already seen—taken them aside to tell them that He must suffer, and die, and rise again, yet the only impression made upon their minds was simply that there would be difficulties and dangers to be encountered in setting up His throne, but eventually—on the third day"—He would rise to power. This was their controlling thought—the staple of their conversation.

This idea was held also by many others besides the apostles. It was, in fact, the popular idea. At the time they entered Jericho it must have been very intense among the members of this company, both because of affection from the spirit of the apostles and because of what they had seen and heard, from day to day, themselves.

All this Jesus knew perfectly well—for "He knew all men" (John ii., 24)—and now was His chosen opportunity to correct it. He was just closing His interview with Zaccheus, and saying to him in the hearing of all, "This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is the son of Abraham. For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Verses 9, 10.) This was thus a public declaration concerning His host and Himself—that the publican had received "salvation," and that He had "come to save." The multitude, probably, interpreted it as simply a foretelling that His mission was to "save" all of the "Sons of Abraham" from the dominion of Rome.

But "as they heard these things, He added and spake a parable, because He was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the Kingdom of God should immediately appear." (v., 11.) The purpose of the parable was, therefore, to make it clear as possible that, instead of being about to meet their expectations, there would be a long interval before He would sit upon the throne of His glory in undisputed power.

The parable itself was based on historical facts with which all of His hearers were familiar. They knew that in all parts of the Roman Empire it was customary, if not necessary, for those who claimed, or desired, to have jurisdiction in the conquered provinces to repair to the Imperial City to have their titles and authority confirmed by the Senate or the Emperor. Thus, they know that in their own land, "Herod the Great hastened to Rome to obtain the kingdom of Judea from Antony, which, having received, he was solemnly proclaimed King of the Jews. By the last will and testament of this monarch, his son, Archelaus, was constituted ruler of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea, yet could not enter upon his Ethnarchship until his dignity was confirmed by Augustus. Accordingly he went to Rome—literally 'into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom'—but the Jews, knowing his purpose, sent thither fifty ambassadors to entreat Augustus that Archelaus might not be made their King, and were so far successful that, though Augustus confirmed him in his government as Ethnarch, he would not invest him with the regal name and dignity." (Bishop Stevens.)

HE REFERRED TO HIMSELF.

It was no strange thing therefore to which Jesus called attention when He said in His parable, "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." They did not know, however, that in that "nobleman" He referred to Himself.

The parable, however, was not told simply to declare that He was going away, but also that the interval, until He should return to reign, was not to be spent either in vain regrets or careless indifference, or in longing expectations, but in active service. As loyal, loving, subjects they were to be as attentive to the interests of His Kingdom during His absence as when He was present with them. So He said of this nobleman, "He called his ten servants and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them—Occupy till I come," or as the Revised Version states it—"Trade ye herewith till I come." (v., 13.)

It is not to be supposed, however, that "ten servants" were all that this "nobleman" had, or that he selected from the whole number only "ten" to receive his special gifts and confidence. On the contrary, the number "ten" is used only in a symbolical sense as expressing the whole number of those who served him, just as the whole "covenant" of God given to Moses is said to be simply "the ten words." (Ex., xxxiv., 28, margin.) It is a common form of expression in the Scriptures. In like manner the "ten pounds" which he delivered to his servants was not a small portion of his possessions, but the whole; the interests of his whole dominion. They were to care for them during his absence in his stead and for his benefit.

And every one, it will be noticed, had an equal share in this trust. Each one received a pound, and each one recognized it as not his own, but his lord's. The trust was committed to them and received by them, as "his servants." They were not "friends" of whom he could only ask a favor. Neither were they "vassals" on whom he could lay heavy burdens. But they were his loyal subjects who looked to him as their rightful lord and master, whose every interest was bound up with the prosperity of his kingdom, and in whose loyalty he could trust with perfect confidence. The trust committed to them, therefore, is not as in the parable of "The Talents," "to every man according to his several ability." (Matthew, xxv., 15.) But all stand on the same level. To all alike, and to all equally, is intrusted the common welfare, and the honor of their lord, for they are "his servants."

The exact application intended by our Lord of this condition of affairs, is not made known to us, but it may be suggested that it is a significant representation of God's dealings with men. When He created him, He committed His whole creation to his care, (Genesis, i., 28-30,) virtually saying to him, "Occupy till I come." (Psalms, viii., 4-9.) This trust He has never as yet taken from Him. To use for Him, therefore, the life given him in the world as the creature of God, and so in the highest sense "His servant," is a trust which rests equally upon every one, in every age, in every clime, and in every condition.

TOLD THEM WHAT TO DO.

What specific things these servants of the "nobleman" did with that which was committed to them we are not told. They were simply directed to trade with it, but how was left to their own judgment and free action. The term "trade," however, is borrowed from a fair and honorable mercantile transaction, by which the two parties interested are mutually benefited. In such a transaction the articles exchanged, although differing in character, are considered of equivalent value, but that which each receives is of more importance to him than that which he gives in exchange for it. Thus the interests of both are promoted by the transaction.

This is the relation of man to man everywhere. The great business of the world is simply a matter of exchange—a giving and a receiving—and all with which men "trade," belongs to the God and Father of us all. No man can say that that which he has is his own, excepting in a very limited and comparative sense. In his daily life he is simply using that which has been given him only for a season. For whatever he receives by the use of it some one else should receive an equivalent; it should benefit some one else, and be to the interest of God's supremacy in the world, just as much as it benefits him. So the servants of this "nobleman" were expected to care for the trust committed to them, and to "occupy" till he came.

In fulfilling this trust it is evident that the conduct of these servants was determined by certain definite considerations. Some of them were deeply impressed with the thought that they owed everything they had to him whose right it was to reign over them. They were "his servants." The one ambition of each one, therefore, was to advance his interests in everything with which they were connected, as far as it was in their power. They recognized, however, that some could not do as much as others because of natural infirmities, or force of circumstances, or lack of opportunities, or because of youth and inexperience. But each one was bound to do, and glad to do, whether old or young, learned or ignorant, rich or poor, bond or free, what he could, and all that he could. This was a controlling thought. It was based on their estimate of their lord and of their relation to him.

In addition to this sense of personal responsibility, each one was evidently impressed with the thought of his own perfect freedom. He could do with his pound just as he pleased, trade with it, squander it, wrap it in a napkin, or hide it in the earth. No restriction was placed upon him as to how he should trade, or in what he should trade. What he did, therefore, was not of compulsion, but voluntarily and gladly.

A JOYFUL EXPECTATION.

Moreover, these servants were evidently firmly convinced that their lord would certainly return clothed with majesty and power. This was not a dread apprehension, however, but a joyful expectation. And as they saw his property increasing in their hands, this expectant joy was realized in their daily lives. So they lived and labored filled with glad anticipations.

In all this we have the work—and the motives—of God's true servants depicted, as they go in and out in the world fulfilling His will.

There is another fact also brought before us in the parable. The "nobleman" at last returned, and then he commanded those servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading." (V. 15.) Then it was found that in the hands of some the gain had been tenfold, in those of others five, and probably in various other proportions in the hands of others. Each one was rewarded according to his gain, and the ground of his reward was his faithfulness.

It is no mere play upon words, however, to say that "faith-ful" is only a short way of saying "full of faith." For the "faithfulness" of those who were rewarded was due to the fact that they were controlled in all that they did by an abiding faith in their lord—in their own responsibilities—and in a confident expectation of his return. But he who had no such faith—who had an altogether wrong conception of the character of his lord and of his own relation to him—was stirred to no effort. With great self-complacency and self-indulgence, he wrapped his pound in a napkin, satisfied to return it to his lord when no increase. Instead of reward he received only rebuke, and that which had been intrusted to him was given to another who had been more faithful.

Thus while the children of God will be judged and justified according to their faith, they will be rewarded according to their works, (Heb., vi., 10; Luke, xiv., 14,) for their works grow out of their faith.

But there were others in the dominion of this "nobleman" who made no pretense to be "his servants." They openly and persistently proclaimed that they would not have him reign over them. Now he proclaims that he will not have them under him, and they are brought forth to be slain. It is a foreshadowing of that great day when men shall cry "to the mountains and the rocks, fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of His wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" (Rev., vi., 12-17.)

QUESTIONS ON THE LESSON.

What parables set forth the invitations of God, and His rewards, and what is said of them?

What were the expectations of the time, and how were Jesus' words probably understood?

How did He make it clear that His kingdom was not to be immediately set up, and on what was His parable founded?

What feature of His parable illustrated how the time of His absence should be employed?

What did the number "ten" mean as applied to the servants, and to the pounds?

On what relationship was the giving and the receiving of the pound based?

What application of the parable is suggested, and what is said of it?

From what is the term "trade" borrowed, and how does it apply to the relation of man with God?

What different considerations regulated the conduct of these servants toward their lord.

What was the ground of their rewards, and what is said of the word "faithful"?

What was done with those who would not have this lord rule over them?

BALL PLAYERS DEFIED

A LIMIT PUT ON THE CLUBS

Managers Agree that the Membership Shall Not Exceed Sixteen—Magnates' Meeting Ended.

The National League of managers of professional baseball clubs yesterday completed the business on hand at the first session of their annual meeting by bidding defiance to the players' alliance and all threatening bodies, presumably including "Ban" Johnson's new American League. Then the meeting in the Fifth Avenue Hotel adjourned, subject to the call of the Chairman, to finish out the annual meeting some time in the Spring.

The action of the club managers was both sudden and positive. As anticipated in the reports of the meetings published in THE NEW YORK TIMES, the managers rejected in a most decisive manner the application of the Protective Association of Professional Baseball Players. This application, made by a committee of players headed by the ex-baseball player Harry Taylor, now lawyer for the players' alliance, was first heard in a public meeting, and later an abstract of the contract asked by the players was submitted to the League meeting. As a matter of fact, the demands made in public and in the abstract of the document prepared by the players were not similar. This fact was pointed out after the first consideration of the League, whereupon the players asked for another hearing and declared that they wished only for the concessions asked for in the public hearing. This second request was considered by the League, and the ultimatum, embodied in a resolution which was drawn with the assistance of a yellow leather-covered unabridged dictionary, which was still in evidence when the resolution was made public, was as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as the three requests made orally by Attorney Harry Taylor in a public meeting have been so merged in and confused with a large number of new and radically different proposed changes in our players' contracts, which also affect the National agreement, it is impossible intelligently to differentiate them, and that the adoption of such proposed amendments would not only be prejudicial to the individual interests of the clubs, but would, we believe, be destructive to organized baseball.

All requests for a clear interpretation of this resolution were rejected by individual members of the National League. They would only say of the matter, while the Dictionary was removed by a bell boy, that it dismissed the claims of the players and finally settled that matter.

Among the other business transacted by the meeting was the official award of the baseball pennant to the Brooklyn Baseball Club, the adoption of a resolution by which all notices of release of players shall be announced by telegraph instead of by letter, and the re-election of all the members of the old Committee on Arbitration.

A resolution was adopted providing that umpires shall be scheduled equally with the clubs, each umpire to officiate at an equal number of games through the season. This was explained as meaning that the umpires chosen should follow the schedule of games for the season, the changing of umpires being subject to the old rules. It was also agreed that the baseball schedule for 1901 shall begin on April 18, and end on Oct. 6, ten games being played by each club of the League with each other club, divided as in the old agreement. It was further agreed that games should be played in the East on June 17, a holiday in Boston, May 30, and Labor Day.

In connection with the National League's plans to economize, a resolution was adopted whereby it was agreed that it shall be illegal for any club to carry more than sixteen players. After the meeting it was said that this resolution was aimed particularly at the Brooklyn Club. To this the members of the Protective Association of professional baseball players dissented. Charles Zimmer of the Pittsburg Club, who is President of the P. A. of P. B. P., and Hugh Jennings of the Brooklyn Club, Zimmer's associate on the players' committee, were unqualified in their expression of opinion that the resolution was aimed at the players directly and was meant to terrify them into rushing to the League managers to sign contracts, each hoping, by hurrying, to get into the club before the limit of sixteen players was reached. The players seemed confident, in spite of the action of the National League managers, and have not yet given up hope of success. Immediately that the League's decision was announced in the morning, the players communicated with Harry Taylor, their attorney, who is in Buffalo, and made arrangements for a meeting to be held, probably on Sunday. Then they will arrange to present their claims in a new form to the League at the Spring meeting, and will sit back to await results.

Before the League meeting adjourned George Tebeau, T. F. Hickey, and C. J. Beall were heard on an application that the territory contained in Kansas City, Minneapolis, and St. Paul be conceded to them as part of the Western Baseball League. The concession was made, which raises the Western Association to an eight-club league. At the same time the National League, at the request of the same petitioners, raised the Western League to Class A.

No mention of Ban Johnson and his new American League was made according to official announcement, and the meeting adjourned without having taken action on the promise of a baseball fight. Johnson is still in Philadelphia, and patrons of baseball are waiting for him to make the next move toward bringing on a conflict.

No Princeton-Harvard Baseball Game.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Dec. 14.—According to an announcement made by the university baseball management to-day, Princeton and Harvard will not meet on the diamond next Spring. Harvard was willing to schedule only two games, while Princeton urged that three games should be scheduled, so that in case of a tie when two of the games were played a third game would decide which team was the better. At Harvard's request last season, but two games were scheduled, and, as each team captured one, as both the Crimson and Tiger players also won two games from Yale, the question of which team should properly claim the championship was quite in doubt.

MANAGER FOR COLUMBIA.

E. D. Morgan, ex-Commodore of the New York Yacht Club, and one of the best known of racing yachtsmen, will manage the old defender Columbia in the trial races against the new boat building by Herreshoff for the New York syndicate. C. Oliver Iselin's refusal to accept further responsibility in the international races for the America's Cup left the Cup Committee of the New York Yacht Club in a difficult situation, as none of the yachtsmen approached was willing to devote his time next Summer to the rather thankless task of managing the trial horse for a new boat that occupied the centre of public interest. Mr. Morgan, who owns the Columbia jointly with C. Oliver Iselin and J. Pierpont Morgan, was finally induced to solve the difficulty by assuming the management himself.

The Columbia will be sailed in the trial races by Capt. "Charley" Barr, her skipper during her successful defense of the America's Cup against the Shamrock.

Harlem Wheelmen Elect Officers.

The annual election of the Harlem Wheelmen, held at the clubhouse, 21 West One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Street, resulted in a victory for the regular ticket, as follows: President—George J. Cooke; Vice President—John Furlong; Secretary—Thomas A. Roe; Treasurer—John H. Valentine; Captain—Edward A. Daily; Governors, to serve two years—Thomas O'Reilly, Edward J. Byrne, Paul P. J. Donvan, August C. Nanz, John Farrell, George W. Fisher, Harry J. Collins. Unusual interest was taken in the contest, 132 votes being cast.

Gaelic Football Game for Trophy.

The Gaelic football game between the Sarsfields and Meaghers, which is to be played at Celtic Park, Long Island City, to-morrow afternoon, promises to be one of the hottest of the year. This game will decide the ownership of a silver cup which the same teams played for last July. That game resulted in a draw.

BRUSHES ON THE SPEEDWAY.

Speedway drivers seem very reluctant to give up their favorite pastime, for they turned out in force yesterday despite the cold weather and spent a very lively afternoon on the stretch behind their fast-steppers. The roan pacer Moth Miller, 2:07, driven by Dr. Randall, proved himself to be in the very best of condition. She was started in a number of brushes, and without a single exception won every one of them. About the closest brush she had was with the old favorite, Jack, 2:12, driven by Dr. Gill, and the handsome little pacer Ada P., 2:09¾, driven by David Lamar. Jack got a little the best of the start and was away like a flash. Nearing the first quarter post both Ada P. and Moth Miller closed the gap and the three pacers came down the stretch nose and nose. When within a hundred yards of the finish Jack attempted to make a spurt, but his opponents were equal to the occasion, Moth Miller even gaining a little, which won the race for her. A blanket would have covered the three horses as they crossed the line.

The brown pacer Little Barefoot, 2:18¼, driven by William Clark of Yonkers, had several hot brushes and beat Amboy, 2:18, driven by M. Beakes, two heats out of three.

Honor Bright, driven by John F. Cockerill, carried Ada P. to a break, and Little Barefoot, (2:18¼,) covered a very fast half with the bay pacer N. T. B., (2:21¼,) driven by James Kennedy, who lost the brush by a length.

The last brush of the afternoon was between Jack, (2:12,) and Moth Miller. Jack got the better of the start and held it until the stretch was reached, when Moth Miller passed the big pacer and beat him out by an open length. Louis Victor, a new trotter on the Speedway, with a mark of 2:10, showed off his speed to good advantage and won several very creditable brushes.

Among those on the road were Charles Weiland, driving the bay mare Salient; George Coleman, driving Hattie Walters, (2:22¾;) George C. Benton, driving a team of black pacers; George Spear, driving the bay pacer Beacon Light, (2:26¼,) and Robert Newman, driving his fleet little green pacer Lady Glenn.

English Jockeys Should Be Censured.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The Earl of Crewe, in an address before the Gimcrack Club, at York City, last evening referred to the "American invasion" of the English turf and said it was not fair to confine censure of unjustifiable practices to the American jockeys, as the English jockeys were also guilty of rough riding.

COLUMBIA'S CREW FINANCES.

Rowing at the University Is in a Healthy Condition and No Debts Exist.

Ex-Manager W. A. Oakley of the Columbia crew made public yesterday his report of the rowing finances of the university for the past season. It appears from the report that the expenses of the year were $8,553.50, and that this amount was covered by receipts from different sources which foot up to the same sum. Notwithstanding the evenness of the report totals, there was said to be a favorable balance of $675.21, but unpaid bills left over from last year reduced this profit and left a deficit of $407.54, which has been made up by the new manager, O. W. Erdal, so that Columbia will begin work in the Spring with a clean sheet.

Toward the end of the report is given a comparative statement of the receipts and expenses of the year. It seems that there were several special sources of income to cover additional expenses of repairing the launch. The statement follows:

RESOURCES.

Actual receipts	$8,553.50
Accounts receivable	339.00
Total	$8,892.50

The foregoing are classified as follows:

Ordinary receipts, (the usual sources of income)	$7,126.59

EXPENSES.

Total actual payments	$8,553.50
Bills payable	207.60

These are classified as follows:

Ordinary expenses	$6,347.45
Unusual expenses	2,412.75

"The analysis," says the report, "is of importance as showing that, had the rowing interests begun the season unincumbered by the deficit of the preceding year and by the need of extraordinary repairs to the launch, due to several years of previous use, the graduate and undergraduate subscriptions would have been ample to cover all proper expenses of the crews. The dissolution of the Columbia University Rowing Club in October, 1899, just before the date of the payment of its annual dues, usually amounting to about $2,000, deprived the crew of a fund out of which the unpaid bills of 1899 and the unusual expenditures upon the launch might have been paid. This was in some small part made good by a contribution of $500 from the new athletic association.

"The results of the season's work, however, seem to justify the statement that the crews can easily be maintained out of graduate and undergraduate subscriptions."

The report has been received with a considerable degree of satisfaction by the undergraduates, for it is the first time in many years that Columbia has finished the rowing season with a clean balance sheet.

J. P. Morgan Sells the Algonquin.

Ex-Commodore J. Pierpont Morgan of the New York Yacht Club has sold his auxiliary schooner yacht Algonquin, through Manning's Yacht Agency, to John H. Flagler of this city. The Algonquin, which was formerly called the Gadabout, was designed by J. Beavor-Webb, and built at Montreal in 1892. Her principal measurements are: Length over all, 98 feet; on the water line, 76 feet; beam, 17 feet; depth of hold, 10 feet 6 inches, and draught, 10 feet. The yacht now lies at the Poilion yards, South Brooklyn, where new machinery is being installed. She will be enrolled in the fleets of the New York, Larchmont, and American Yacht Clubs, of which Mr. Flagler is a member.

COTTON EXCHANGE RULES.

The Soliciting of Business—A Broker Suspended for Six Months.

The New York Cotton Exchange managers ruled at a meeting on Thursday that when a member receives an order to buy and another order to sell on the same day, the commission charge shall be $5; also that there is no infringement of the commission law where a Stock Exchange house, which is also a Cotton Exchange member, solicits business through an employe in charge of a branch office, and also that an agent cannot be employed by more than one firm, neither can he be in business for his own account and at the same time be an employe.
The managers have found Charles F. Schneiker, a broker, guilty of the violation of the Exchange rules and have suspended him for six months from Dec. 19. The complaint was made by John Collins, who alleged that Mr. Schneiker traded for Mr. Collin's clerk without the written consent necessary to make such trade.

MARKET MOVEMENT.

Under the leadership of the coal stocks and the standard railway shares the stock market yesterday took on a tone of aggressive strength—showed, in fact, stronger than at any time since the few days immediately following the election. Prices advanced throughout the entire list, the gains in some instances being most substantial, with the close buoyant and at the best for the day. In the early trading sentiment was encouraged by the higher prices sent over from London, an extreme gain of 2 points being recorded in Wabash preferred. These higher figures were followed by large buying orders for London account, fully 50,000 shares being taken on balance. At the same time the large financial interests and Western operators, who recently have been conspicuous as purchasers, came into the market as buyers on a very large scale, this showing in the total transactions for the day, which ran up above 1,200,000. Money remained comparatively easy all day, with the close at 5 per cent.—which was considered significant in view of the fact that there is no money market to-day, loans carrying over until Monday.

St. Paul was the leader of the market, marking a net advance of 3½ points, while gains of a point or more were made in such securities as Burlington, Reading first and second preferred, Northern Pacific, Delaware and Hudson, Baltimore and Ohio, Atchison preferred, Missouri Pacific, and other standard stocks.

The industrials in the late trading shared in the advance, Steel and Wire being conspicuous, with a net gain of 1⅞ points.

The bank statement to be issued to-day is awaited with much interest. According to the preliminary figures, the banks have lost in cash to the Sub-Treasury during the week fully $5,000,000, but to offset this they have gained slightly from the interior, while it is understood there has been some gain in local cash, though how does not appear. In any event, general expectation is that surplus reserves will be considerably reduced, though the extreme view that they may be wiped out is not credited.

ST. PAUL was the market leader, advancing on buying for Western account, the name of President Hill of Great Northern being heard in this connection. It was said, indeed, that Mr. Hill is to enter the St. Paul board, but Chairman Roswell Miller declared that he knew nothing of the report. The buying is said to be on advance information that the stock is to be put on a 6 per cent. dividend basis. This report has been heard for some time, but cannot be confirmed.

BURLINGTON followed closely behind St. Paul in point of leadership. The buying which advanced the stock came principally from Boston, from which city private advices told of good progress made by the company in its bond-refunding plans.

STEEL AND WIRE AND TENNESSEE COAL were the leaders of the steel stocks, the former advancing on buying credited to John W. Gates and the latter rising sharply on short covering. It is now declared that Steel and Wire is certain of at least a 5 per cent. dividend this coming year, while in some quarters it is stated with much positiveness that the present rate of 7 per cent. will be maintained. The stock will sell ex-dividend of 1¾ per cent. on Monday.

ATCHISON shares advanced on investment buying, the shorts in the securities fighting the advance all the way up. There was much short selling of the stocks about a week ago when the telegraphers' strike was announced and the interest thus created remains uncovered.

WABASH securities were bought steadily all day both for home and London account, and it was again stated positively that Vanderbilt interests were buyers of the shares. President Ashley of Wabash, however, said during the day: "So far as I know, outside interests have not purchased Wabash. Our transfer books do not show anything to indicate buying by Vanderbilt or other interests."

WHEELING AND LAKE ERIE shares were advanced by the same buying that lately has been in evidence, coming from Standard Oil brokers. As to what the purpose is, no information is forthcoming beyond talk of some pending developments in the Ohio coal fields.

In all the Pacific issues there was good buying. Northern Pacific showed most strength, and in connection with the advance in the stock it was declared that announcement is shortly to be made of some new relations with Great Northern. Missouri Pacific, reports to the contrary notwithstanding, is soon to go on a dividend basis—this from official sources.

All the Vanderbilt stocks were strong, brokers usually acting for Vanderbilt interests being buyers of the issues. Next week is meeting week for action on the dividends on the stocks, and in the Street favorable action is looked for. It is not believed, however, that there is any foundation for the report that the dividend on New York Central is to be increased.

Morgan buying was responsible for the large advances in the Reading issues, the first preferred gaining 1¾ points and the second preferred 2½. In coal trade circles it is declared that the Reading's coal lands alone are worth at the least $300,000,000, and that it occupies the strongest position of any company in the coal field. Friends of J. P. Morgan were quoted yesterday as saying that a 4 per cent. dividend rate is assured on the first preferred stock.

The decline in the Erie shares was on London selling, the prices for the Eries from there being much below the closing quotations here. This, it was said, was due to the fact that enough stock had been acquired for the purposes contemplated, and hence that inside support was withdrawn.

TRADE DEVELOPMENTS.

Steady improvement continues to show in every line of trade. While there have been no radical developments during the present week, there has been a steady and consistent improvement which in the business and financial world is regarded with much more satisfaction, because more healthful, than is the case when the developments show in the nature of a boom.

More seasonable weather is reported throughout the country, and wholesale and retail trades alike, particularly in clothing and dry goods, have benefited as a result. In iron and steel nothing but encouraging reports are heard, telling not only of strengthening prices, but of large orders placed or to be placed.

Collections are reported very good, and it is a noticeable fact that notwithstanding the predictions of dear money, there is an abundance of available cash for legitimate business purposes and at reasonable rates.

STEEL MEN IN CONFERENCE.

An informal conference of Federal Steel and Steel and Wire officials was held in the offices of the Federal Steel Company yesterday, but no information on the subject was given out. It is understood, however, that the trade situation generally was discussed and that contracts between the two companies were arranged.

THOMAS F. RYAN'S DENIAL.

In relation to a report that he was to enter the Board of Directors of Brooklyn Rapid Transit as a representative of Metropolitan Street Railway interests Thomas F. Ryan said yesterday: "I know nothing about the report that I am to be elected a Director of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit. The board is composed of strong and capable men, and I could not add anything to its strength."

OUTSIDE SECURITIES.

AMERICAN WOOLEN for the first time in several days showed considerable activity, and both the common and preferred stocks closed with net gains. The latter advanced to 77¾ and closed there with a net gain of 2¼ points. Over 500 shares were traded in. The common on somewhat larger transactions advanced to 21¾ and made a net gain of one-half a point.

PITTSBURG, BESSEMER, AND LAKE ERIE was fairly active around 29 and at the close was 29 bid, a fractional net gain. Early in the day it was reported from Pittsburg that the preferred stock still unissued, which amounts to $500,000, would be distributed as a stock dividend to the common stock holders of record at the close of business to-day. The report was not confirmed, but it was widely disseminated. The feature of the trading was the number of cash sales made for the apparent purpose of procuring the stock before the books close to-day in case the report should prove true.

SINGER MANUFACTURING.—It was learned yesterday that it is proposed to increase the capital stock of the Singer Manufacturing Company from $10,000,000 to $30,000,000, the new stock to be distributed as a stock dividend to present holders. This will be equivalent to a stock dividend of 200 per cent. At the offices of the company it was stated that the officers had nothing to say in regard to the matter, but it is known that a circular calling a meeting to be held next Monday to ratify the increase in stock was issued about a week ago to the stockholders. During recent years the company has paid very large dividends, which have resulted in high prices for the stock. In 1898 30 per cent. in dividends was paid, and last year the dividends amounted to 100 per cent. Since the beginning of this year only 5 per cent. quarterly has been paid, and for a time this caused a considerable falling off in the price of the stock. Recently, however, the quotation has advanced rapidly, which is explained by the plan to declare such a large stock dividend. Yesterday 725 was bid.

REAL ESTATE TRANSFERS.

In the following list "mtg" stands for mortgage and "R S" for revenue stamps. The war revenue law provides that stamps shall be placed on all conveyances at the rate of 50 cents for each $500 of consideration. This "consideration" has been held to mean only the equity above the mortgage, except in the rare cases where the purchaser assumes payment of the mortgage. The amount of the mortgage plus 1,000 times the value of the revenue stamps on the conveyances should therefore show the true consideration.

The Pianola is a practical Christmas present which will bring pleasure to the entire family throughout the year. Aside from an enjoyable entertainment, the recital will afford you an opportunity to hear the Pianola and to judge its qualifications for satisfactorily deciding your most important gift question.

The Pianola is a piano player, i. e., it enables every one to play upon the piano at will any selection he desires to hear. It is not necessary for the player to know one note from another, yet he has all the pleasure of hand-playing because he controls the expression which is the soul of music.

The Pianola is entirely separate from the piano, and does not mar it in any way. It can be used to play any piano.

Our New UCANBEZ

(You Can Be Easy)

$5.00 Shoe for Men

is the Shoe for all mankind. It costs a good bit, we admit—still $5.00 is not a fortune, but the shoes are. They are a fortune of ease and comfort, of release from pain and misery for the feet, and they wear so well that the money spent for them is not begrudged. In fact, you would rather pay $10 for them than not to have them after you have once worn them.

There appears to be a monopoly in this country not only of the translation of "L'Aiglon," but also of its original text. Brentano's, as we have already stated, has secured control of all the copies presented in French in this country, while the translation is owned and copyrighted by R. H. Russell. The latter will issue a beautiful edition de luxe of the play about Dec. 29. This is a special edition of Mr. Louis N. Parker's translation in verse as presented by Miss Maude Adams. The widespread demand for the book has apparently developed a considerable call for a splendid edition of it. The book will be printed on heavy paper, with portraits of Miss Adams in the part, and will be bound in purple leather and stamped in gold with Napoleonic emblems.

A new life of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, written by Dr. R. F. Horton, will be published next week by E. P. Dutton & Co.. It will form one of the volumes in their Saintly Life Series. The first volume of this series, "Elizabeth Rease Nichols," was published early in the year, and received most favorable comment. Dr. Horton is said to portray the great poet laureate from an ethical and religious point of view, with explanations how these traits reveal themselves in the poet's verse. The volume will contain a number of illustrations, including several interesting portraits.

A new volume from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Minot J. Savage is in active preparation at G. P. Putnam's Sons. It is a collection of lectures included in the title "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion." The author, by a series of views of great religious periods in the history of the world contrasted with the formative influences of Christianity, attempts to show what has survived through all upheavals as well as what has come into religion only to pass out again after having produced some definite effect.

"Devil Tales," by Virginia Frazer Boyle, which was published a short time ago by Harper & Brothers, has excited a great deal of serious interest among American folklorists. As explained by the author, the stories are perhaps as near the African traditions as anything that has yet been written, for they were told to her "by her Mammy, who had learned them from her Mammy, who had learned them from her Mammy." This brings to mind a very interesting coincidence. The late David Dwight Wells once told us that in reading a story by Joel Chandler Harris he had recognized the incidents in it as those which made up a legend that had been told to his grandfather by an aged West Indian negro who was born in Africa. There was this exception, however: in the transition from Africa to America the leopard had become Br'er Rabbit, and the other animals in the original legend had undergone a similar metamorphosis. It would be interesting if some African traveler should find time to tell the public about the "originals" of Mr. Harris's stories.

John Lane will shortly publish a new edition of "The Spanish Conquest in America," by Sir Arthur Helps, edited by Mr. Michael Oppenheim. This book is very important, although no edition of it has been easily available for some years. Sir Arthur will probably best be recalled as the editor of the Queen's Journal of her life in the Highlands, although he wrote a great many books himself, and was a most active literary man between the years 1855 and 1875.

A narrative poem by William Young, who dramatized "Ben-Hur," is in press for publication early in January by R. H. Russell. It will be brought out under the title of "Ah, What Riddles These Women Be!" and is said to be partly dramatic and partly satirical. Mr. Young, it may also be recalled, is the author of "Wishmaker's Town" and the two dramatic poems "Pendragon" and "Ganelon," which, followers of the stage will remember, were produced by the late Lawrence Barrett.

There will be no American edition of Ernest Vizetelly's translation of Zola's "Work." The Vizetelly version will be published in England and Australia. The book here will be brought out through a translation made by Mrs. E. W. Lattimer, and will be entitled "Labor," Harper & Brothers having recently secured the full serial and book rights to the story. Mrs. Lattimer is well known as a translator of French books, her name being particularly identified with those of Balzac.

Sportsmen who are artists, or artists who are sportsmen, will be interested to hear of a book which has recently been completed by J. G. Millais, son of Sir John Millais. It will bear the title "The Wildfowler in Scotland." The author tells us that from childhood he has made a special study of the pursuit and natural history of the wildfowl that frequent British coasts. He began armed with that enemy of law and order, the catapult. Then he was promoted to a small twenty-bore, and now is almost a veteran wildfowler. The present work deals entirely with the pursuit of ducks found in Scottish waters. Mr. Millais hopes later to write of the natural history of these ducks and their changes of plumage.

Although the word "sampler" is of frequent occurrence in old English novels, as well as in early American fiction, and specimens of its work are often the most cherished heirlooms in American families to-day, it is a little singular that hitherto no serious attempt has been made to deal with the evolution and history of this form of embroidery. As a matter of fact, the sampler affords a most interesting insight into the education, art, and morals of a past age, and Longmans, Green & Co. are to be congratulated that they have secured a book on the subject written by competent authors. It is entitled "Samplers and Tapestry Embroideries," by Marcus B. Hulah, LL. B., together with the "Stitchery of the Same" by Mrs. Head, and "Foreign Samplers" by Mrs. C. J. Longman. The edition will be strictly limited to 600 copies for England and America. Each volume will be illustrated with thirty reproductions in color by a new and most successful process, and forty illustrations in monochrome.

In an address on James Lane Allen's latest novel, just delivered by the well-known Unitarian minister, Dr. John W. Chadwick of Brooklyn, he quotes Dr. Edward Everett Hale as saying that "The Reign of Law" is worth more to our liberal cause than all the sermons that our ministers have written for a twelvemonth." While not indorsing this sweeping inference against the sermons, Dr. Hale's views, indorsed by Dr. Chadwick and recently also by Dr. Minot J. Savage, are not without interest as opposed to the somewhat violent handling which has been accorded to the hero of the story and its author by the Brothers of Christ, the sect to which the novelist affiliates the hero in the story.

Students of political history of contemporary Europe will be glad to learn that Prof. Seignobos's work on the subject will shortly appear in an English translation. The author, who is one of the greatest authorities in France, tries to make the reader comprehend the phenomenon of political life of Europe in the present century by explaining the organization of the nations and Governments.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The Sumptuous Volume About Him Written by Sir Walter Armstrong.*

Reviewed for THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW by Russell Sturgis.

Two years ago (see THE TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW for Nov. 19, 1898,) there appeared in these columns a review of the work on Gainsborough and his place in English art by Walter Armstrong, Director of the National Gallery, Ireland. The volume whose title is given below is by the same author, who still occupies the same position in the artistical and official world, although his dignity has been enhanced, at least for the British public, by the grant of a new title. The book is a close copy of the Gainsborough volume, so far as its external appearance, its paging, its illustrations, and the like are concerned; nor is the treatment of the personal and the artistical subject very different. There is the same simple and direct way of telling the story and the same convincing general and particular truths about fine art. Since R. A. M. Stevenson's death, our author is the most useful English writer on critical questions.

Our review of 1898 urged the extreme importance in all discussions of fine art of the recognition by writer and reader of the fact that the language of fine art is peculiarly different from that of literature, and that the difficulty of translation of an idea from one language into another is so great as to be comparable only to translation from an Oriental language into an Occidental one, or the reverse. The merit was ascribed to Mr. Armstrong's prose of doing all that could be thought possible to explain to the reader of English what the reader of the art-language finds therein. It is some small gratification to find the same doctrine preached in almost so many words in the course of the present interesting volume as if (though it is not to be stated as a probability) the author of these two books had found himself entirely in agreement with the writer of the review cited.

In a very different way it is gratifying to find the present work a continuation of the former one in the matter of this setting forth of the principles of fine art. The general principles having been laid down in the former volume, the second volume deals rather with the special application of them to the case of Sir Joshua Reynolds. If there is any fault to be found or any exception to be noted it is in this that the faulty habit of painting, which Reynolds gradually adopted, and which has resulted in the loss to the world of the majority of his important pictures, for—though the canvas and the impasto are there—the color design has vanished; that this bad habit is not fully explained. The fact is recognized, but it does not appear that pains have been taken to describe the faulty method, which has resulted so fatally, nor has sufficient stress been laid upon it as a means of warning the modern student against the too hasty conclusion that Sir Joshua Reynolds's pictures, many of them, were never more attractive in color than they now are. As compared with Gainsborough's art that of Sir Joshua Reynolds was faulty, rather than feeble, in technique. When important pictures by both of these great artists, contemporaries and rivals of each other, were first seen by the world of London, it would have been nothing more than matter of opinion on the point of even the shrewdest and most technically well-taught observer to have said boldly that the processes employed by the one artist were better or worse than those employed by the other, but the passage of much less than a century has sufficed to make this distinction clear and to leave the massive and simple work of Gainsborough untouched, while the delicate manipulations of Reynolds have suffered fatally from time even without undue exposure to untoward influences.

No doubt it was felt that it would have been a rash thing on the part of one not employed every day in the practice of painting to attempt to write for a public almost wholly ignorant of what painting is any serious description of technical processes. At least, there is to be found no other lack of thoroughness in treatment of Reynolds's art. Not only in the chapter entitled "The Art of Reynolds" and beginning on Page 157, but in the chapters devoted to the life of Reynolds and afterward to the teaching of Reynolds, there is a frank and unhesitating way of attacking the artistic problem which cannot fail to be a gratification to the well-instructed reader. In this respect, if the book is a little less markedly an art treatise than is the one on Gainsborough, that can be only because there was said in the former volume what needed most to be said, and, secondly, because the personal subject of Sir Joshua is more interesting than that of Gainsborough. There is much more about the President of the Royal Academy, the friend of Johnson and Goldsmith and Garrick, the deaf celebrity with his famous ear trumpet and his pleasant way of avoiding disagreeable arguments, the author of the well-known "Discourses on Painting" and the "Dialogues," then there was of the retired and somewhat unsocial Gainsborough. And then the mere fact that Sir Joshua has to be considered as a lecturer to students and the layer down of rules for the practice of art intended to be final and binding upon all who heard them makes the new volume different from the old one as needing to be a piece of criticism upon a literary and would-be critical performance as well as upon a life of diligent painter's work. This part of the work is ideally well done. It must be read in connection with the analysis of Reynolds's own personal character as set forth in other parts of the book, but that which is said on Page 182 and in the paragraphs immediately following, as to the position taken by Reynolds, show how wholly in error was his assumption that painting could be treated by itself. "The notion of collating one art with another occurred to him but once, and then he made a most unhappy use of it. It never struck him that a theory of art which might fit a picture but would be absurd if applied to a teapot could not be a universal theory. He examined phenomena, and when he had collected a certain number of these from famous works of art he concluded that they were the causes of excellence. Raffaelle was great, Raffaelle painted draperies in the abstract, not silks and velvets, ergo, abstract draperies are the cause of greatness. In all seriousness that is too often the fashion of Sir Joshua's reasoning." Those passages are to be found on Page 182 of this volume, and they are not different in tone or purpose, although perhaps more compressed in significance, than the whole body of this piece of criticism. It is finally said that the experience of the century has refuted Reynolds as a teacher, and the interesting problem is plainly stated, to find out how a man who could leave us so many delightful pages of art was so unsatisfactory as a theorist. "It is common to nearly all artists from Leonardo downward, who have played with the pen," and the solution or partial solution of the problem follows, and is as satisfactory as it could be made in the brief space allotted. After all it was not the purpose of this volume to deal with so vast a problem as that!

It will be seen, then, that the new volume is in every respect a fitting sequel to the former one. Indeed, they could stand together as Volume I. and Volume II. of a work on the English painting of the eighteenth century. If a third volume should deal with Richard Wilson, and with Romney, Morland, John Russell, and their contemporaries, and a fourth volume with Hogarth, considered rather as a painter and as the beginner of British painting than as a preacher of morality in the form of satire, we should have a historical treatise on art which would require no apologies.

The pages from 1 to 150 deal with the life of Reynolds, and are divided into seven chapters. The reader will naturally turn to those pages in which is related the social life which Sir Joshua led in common with the literary celebrities of his time. Of this much is drawn from the pages of Boswell, confirmed as it were and elucidated by Reynolds's own "Dialogues." It is in one of these dialogues, by the way, that the famous remarks are made for which readers often search the pages of Boswell, (Johnson's remarks about the extreme impropriety of quoting a man against himself: "You tease me, Sir. Whatever you may have heard me say, not longer ago than last Wednesday, at Mrs. Thrale's table, I tell you I do not say so now; besides, as I said before, you may not have understood me, you misapprehended me; you may not have heard me.") Oddly enough Dr Johnson appears on the whole more agreeable in the "Dialogues" than in the reports of his professed admirer and toady, the immortal biographer.

Throughout these pages of biography there is, however, no neglect of the artistic part of Sir Joshua's life, which was after all nearly the whole of it. There never was a more diligent workman; and if he confined himself to portraiture and to the social and professional popularity, which gave him wealth and renown, ignoring the much wider field and the more purely artistic life of his great rival, the biography of so able a man pursuing so narrow an existence is not the less interesting.

RUSSELL STURGIS.

"Sharps and Flats," by Eugene Field, published to-day by Charles Scribner's Sons, is a two-volume work of selections of prose and verse collated by Slason Thompson. The selections have been made with considerable care, and perhaps better than anything else represent the exhaustless gayety of Mr. Field's daily life. Here, for example, is a skit on "The Débutante," a sort of parody on "The May Queen":

Have you got the jellies made, Mother?
Are the sandwiches all fait?
Are the salads wrought and the wine all bought
For the splurge on New Year's Day?
You look serene as a regnant Queen,
But there'll be some hitch, I fear,
For I'm to receive this year, Mother—
I'm to receive this year.

JAMES MARTINEAU.

Mr. Jackson's Biography of a Great Teacher and Leader.*

This volume does a lasting service to thought, character, and spiritual religion in America. No biography of more intrinsic value has this season afforded. An Englishman of wide fame, in many respects Dr. Martineau was without a peer as a religious and philosophical teacher and devout champion of pure theism. He had the distinction of belonging to a family of intellectual giants, and he came naturally enough by his bent to themes erudite and scholarly. He illustrated in his life, that covered nearly the decades of a century, Hazlitt's definition of genius—"the capacity for work, work, work." Never was there a more industrious scholar, nor one whose varied activities extended over so vast a length of time or wide a range of subjects. His biographer deals with him as a man, a religious teacher, and a philosopher.

He was a man of varied and multifarious occupations. How he ever accomplished as much as he did, and through so long a period of years, one can hardly conceive. He was at one and the same time minister of a metropolitan church, occupant of a professor's chair, and constant writer for the press and maker of books. With a mind biased toward scientific training and the scientific method of the modern thought movement, and educated for a secular profession, his profound convictions led him into the Christian ministry. Ordained among the English Presbyterians, he was at one time under the ban of public opinion and on the edge of a trial for heresy in the Unitarian Church.

Many delighted to sit reverently at his feet as he fought the battles of religion against the assumptions of so-called scientific theories, partaking with joy of his triumphs as he upheld a noble theism over against the baneful errors of pantheism. Yet it must be sadly confessed multitudes beheld with sorrow and real heart pain the path he blazed for the treading of his intellectual nature, so far apart from the point of view held sacred in New Testament theology and revealed religion. His thoughts on inspiration, revelation, the scope of the Bible, and the nature and mission of Jesus are at variance with the cherished faith of many who reverence his genius, love him for his passion for the love of God and all truth, and delight in his enthusiasm for religion and the indwelling presence of God in the heart of man.

In his "Types of Ethical Theory" Martineau reveals how his heart hungered for something besides mere "scientific conception" of God and the universe. "It was the irresistible pleading of moral consciousness," he writes, "which first drove me to rebel against the limits of the merely scientific conception. It became incredible to me that nothing was possible except the actual. The secret misgivings which I had always felt at either discarding or perverting the terms which constitute the vocabulary of character—'responsibility,' 'guilt,' 'merit,' 'duty'—came to a head, and insisted on speaking out and being heard; and to their reiterated question, 'Is there then no ought to be other than what is?' I found the negative answer of Diderot intolerable, and all other answer impossible." He found just here that determinism must be given up and the doctrine of causation revised. To follow him all through would be to restate the whole history of the philosophy of religion. Its chapters open vistas on knowledge, cause, the intellectual and moral aspects of the universe, personality, pantheism, freedom, and immortality.

But hear him as he utters his wonderful credo in the face of scientific and agnostic skepticism: "If you place me face to face not with an infinite living spirit, but only with what is called 'the Great Necessity,' what enthusiasm do you expect the vision to excite? Can there be a more paralyzing spectacle? and shall I fling myself with passionate ardor into the arms of that ghastly physical giant? It is impossible: homage to an automaton universe is no better than mummy worship is to one who has known what it is to love and trust and to embrace the living friend. In short, a human soul so placed would itself be higher than aught it knows within the immensity and could worship nothing there without idolatry." Thus his wonderful sentences roll on until he reaches the climax of perfect communion between the heart of man and the heart of God.

Following his biographer is like treading the wonderland of Swiss scenery, the vale of beauty, the emerald lake, the Alpine glow, the white and vaulted temple kissing the stars, the avalanche's awful thunder—then the majestic stillness of those eternal hills, where, from intellectual altitudes, the breath of heaven blows through your being.

The portrait of such a mind has a thousand different aspects. Dr. Martineau's acquisitive power was great and varied. With all his joyousness there was ever in his written word an undertone of sadness. But when the battle was hottest and those who differed from him criticised with keenest blade, he was ever cheerful, dignified, and with a sweet reasonableness.

To him as to all men were the tides of the spirit, "its ebbs as well as its floods"; yet failing to meet him on the Mount of Beatitudes we should have looked for him on the slopes of Sinai, and wondered not to find him there.

It was my privilege to form acquaintance with him in extreme age. Of course I expected to meet a scholar; but a scholar may be a Johnson. I knew I was to confront a thinker, but a thinker may be a Schopenhauer. I held him a man of genius, but a genius may be a Byron or a Carlyle.

The thought of meeting one so crowned with honors was attended with natural anxieties. Two hands extended in welcome, a gracious smile, a cordial word, and all anxieties were gone. The happy discovery was made that his greatness was of the kind that lifts, but does not overpower. A saint, a hero, a sage—and habitué of the academy, who thrilled to the Categorical Imperative, and who knelt at the Cross.

As a higher critic of the New Testament, Dr. Martineau has gone to extremes that few of those to whom Jesus Christ is the manifestation of the Father and the image of His person, and dearly cherished and adored as the Resurrection and the Life would care to follow. He turned from both an infallible Church and an infallible Book to his own infallible consciousness, though he would never admit as much. He believed in the continuous revelation of God to the inner spirit of man. A large truth, but needing to be conceived with care. It is true that God does not cease to reveal Himself in the soul. But that does not preclude the intrinsic value of the incarnation. It is the divine man, speaking with the authority of the Infinite who guides the soul out of the maze and madnes of sin into the haven of forgiveness, peace, and harmony with God.

As the champion of an exalted theism, Dr. Martineau deserves the gratitude of humanity. The century has not witnessed so bold and original a thinker, and one whose virile arguments have so completely routed the pretensions of agnosticism and unveiled their shallowness. In his chapters on "God and Cosmos," and "God and Conscience," Mr. Jackson has exhibited Martineau at his best. Indeed, these second and third chapters of Book III., are the finest in the volume. They show the massive strength of the mind that wrestled with the problems that revolve around the idea of God, the designing Will in the universe, the freedom of human will, and immortality.

Right thinking must come very near Dr. Martineau's position when in his ethical doctrines he compares two criteria of judgment. They are prudence and conscience. Prudence is the guiding principle in the utilities; conscience our light in settling between conflicting motives. Prudence never yet saved a soul, or a world. Growth in excellency is not mere escape from vicissitudes. Might rules in the world and would rule, alter it as you please. But what do we mean by might? It is not always physical, it may be, yea, in the higher activities it must be spiritual. What sentiment was it that made Cromwell's Ironsides invincible? and led William of Orange to victory over the vastly superior forces of Spain?

No pretense is made that the true, or right, because overmastering sentiments meet with no impediments. To the world Calvary proclaims defeat. The Huguenots and the Waldenses were humiliated to the dust. But wait. What does the closing decade of the nineteenth century proclaim? Christianity, the teachings of the Victim of the Cross triumphant. Protestantism regnant. The martyr of one age the hero and leader of the next. Savonarola hanged and burned, his ashes tossed upon the sea, rushing tides mightier than Savonarola alive and with regal eloquence making the Florentine populace bow before him, as the wheat bends its golden head before the Summer breeze. Listen to Martineau's own words:

Can anybody name a good cause which, not locally, but in the world at large, has perished and had no resurrection? Intervals of suspended animation there may be, but the final mortality of the 'better part' I must utterly disbelieve. When we say of the baffled reformer, 'He was born before his time,' we confess our assurance that his time must come, and betray the fact that for us at least it has already come.

Among Martineau's many essays, reviews, and books may be mentioned as most worthy the consideration of those who really want to make the most of themselves in this world and the next, "Endeavors After the Christian Life," "Types of Ethical Theory," "Seat of Authority in Religion," and "Study of Religion." Would that the lofty arguments and pure sentiments that inspire many of his pages could be brought to the attention of multitudes of young men in America who are stricken with moral malady.

The taint of agnosticism, and a blank, hopeless, godless life rest upon so many of our youth, who imagine it a sign of "the smart set" to display total ignorance of virtue, and at the same time be steeped in the vulgarity of vice.

If there is no Supreme Will whose dictum is authority in the world, if there is no conscience shedding its lustre on the path of right and duty, how may we hope for good citizens who on occasion will sacrifice self at the call of patriotism?

Physical science and material culture will not keep the nation from the bottomless pit. Physical force, as it displays itself in the myriad forms in which science delights in arraying nature, has accomplished much for society. But the material is not all. Nor is this when co-operating with the mental the highest force the world knows; for then the preponderance of brute strength and mental force would always mean victory. There is another force called moral, or spiritual force, which arises from the conscious service of right and truth, and this when supported by religious faith may make weakness an impregnable fortress or an invincible escalabar.

In short, this book is a study, not only of a man, but of one of the most powerful religious movements of the nineteenth century. One does not, therefore, make a mistake in commending this volume to the attention of the thoughtful, because of the great personality of which it is a portrait, and because of the world-wide thought which proclaim him as belonging not to a little sect, but as a triumphant leader of the Church universal.

A Perfect Collection of Poe's Works.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The literary and daily press have joined in asserting that the McKee library, recently dispersed in part, contained the "only absolutely perfect Poe collection ever gathered together." According to Webster, the word perfect means "without defect or lack; complete." Such a definition the McKee collection did not meet, for it failed to include these important Poe items:

The Prose Romances of Edgar A. Poe, No. 1. [All published.] "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" and "The Man That was Used Up." (8vo, Philadelphia, 1843.) Only two copies known, one of which, with a collection of newspaper and magazine clippings, was, in 1894, catalogued at $250. It was sold and its present whereabouts is unknown. In the Stedman-Woodberry editions of Poe's works the editors say of "Prose Romances": "The edition is of great rarity and has not been seen by the editors."

Baltimore Saturday Visitor, Oct. 12, 1833—This contained the first publication of "MS. Found in a Bottle," for which Poe received a prize of $100 offered by that journal for the best story.

American Museum for December, 1838—"How to Write a Blackwood Article" and "A Predicament, (The Scythe of Time.) a Pendant to the Preceding Tale."

Philadelphia Saturday Chronicle and Mirror of the Times, May 18, 1839. This contains the very first publication of "The Devil in the Belfry."

Saturday Evening Post, (Philadelphia,) Nov. 27, 1841. "Three Sundays in a Week."

The Flag of Our Union, 1849. "Hop-Frog."

Philadelphia Saturday Museum, March 4, 1843. "The Sleeper."

Undoubtedly the McKee library represented the nearest approach to a perfect Poe collection, past or to come. The foregoing simply shows that, no matter how long the purse, human life is too short for a perfect book collection in any one direction. Especially is this true in the case of an author like Poe, who published nearly all his tales repeatedly, both in periodicals and in volumes, often revising the text. When one considers the fact that no files exist of such periodicals as The Flag of Our Union and The Philadelphia Dollar Newspaper, and that other obscure publications which harbored Poe items escape the closest search, he is moved to the conviction that even the millions of a Rockefeller might be unable to get together the "perfect Poe collection."

A Lesson for Schoolgirls.*

Brenda is disobedient, a trifle cunning, conceited and of a jealous disposition. In fact, Brenda is a disagreable girl. The author intends that Brenda shall be an example of a girl whose traits are not to be followed. As to Belle, that young lady is somewhat of a toady. There are four girls who make up the club. The club would not be so exclusive if it were not for Brenda, who is a petty tyrant. When Julia, who is Brenda's cousin, comes to Boston, she is excluded from membership. Julia has many winning traits, and all the girls, Brenda and Belle excepted, are fond of her. The prattle of young ladies of fifteen or sixteen Helen Leah Reed follows most amusingly. All the characters go to a fashionable school, and are fortunate in having an excellent instructress. A little waif, Manuel Rosas, excites the sympathies of the girls. Much space is given to the description of a charity bazaar, which is managed in the interest of the Rosas family by the club of four. Brenda's services are rather more ornamental than practical.

In the course of the story the author introduces much that is interesting about old Boston. There is a sketch of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, with an interview, the latter unquestionably drawn from an actual meeting with the author of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table." Young aspirants for athletic fame, the football players of the colleges, find a place in this story. There are ever so many useful lessons imparted in the book, and one is about English composition. It may be that in the latitude of Boston there is the prodigal use by young ladies of the word "nice." In New York the younger representatives of the gentler sex are lavish with "perfectly splendid." In "Brenda" there is to be found the soundest advice as to the distribution of charity. Brenda was only a wayward girl, and in time let us hope that all her faults were corrected. The illustrations are capital.

One of the most attractive books for boys will be Cyrus Townsend Brady's story, "Reuben James," which is announced by D. Appleton & Co. Reuben James was a "real" man, who had a most remarkable career as an American man-of-war's man in the early part of the present century. The way he has been handled by Mr. Brady again illustrates the adage that "truth is stranger than fiction."

"The selections from Dr. Van Dyke's prose and verse have been made with sympathetic intelligence. The author is singularly happy in his gift of putting wise thoughts into brief and telling sentences. JAY, A DOG.

His Observations Chronicled in San Francisco.*

This volume, which bears the imprint of San Francisco publishers, Messrs. D. P. Elder & Morgan Shepard, will be found most attractive by all children who are lovers of animals, and even more so by the children of a larger growth into whose hands the volume may happen to fall.

The typography and illustrations of the volume are remarkably good, the latter being used as a sort of half title to each chapter, sometimes also containing the opening words of its first paragraph. Each chapter also opens with the most curiously attractive little initial, which investigation shows to be a very small reproduction of the full-page illustration. The book is issued in three editions, the ordinary issue, the "children's edition," which is most attractively bound in gay fabrics, at $1.50 per copy, while a small edition is bound in old brocades and silk and is to be had at $2 each. The copy before us is one of those intended for children and is most attractively bound in a cream-gray ribbed cotton, stamped with a pretty all-over design of elaborately patterned rings in red and blue, the colors blending in one harmonious whole. The titles for both side and back are pretty paper labels printed in black, with considerable use of red lines, its cover lining being heavy silvered paper. The paper on which the volume is printed is soft and of an agreeable tint, and the book is unusually well made, opening freely, without the slightest strain upon its back, its whole manufacture reflecting great credit in every way upon its publishers and printers, the work having been done at the Murdoch Press.

The observations of the dog, Jay, which give title to the book, form the subject of its first chapter; the second chapter continuing these observations. The first portion will be found to explain, from the dog's standpoint, the meaning of the five great wags, which are most minutely described; for Jay, or his creator, who claims, like Seton-Thompson, to understand the animal language, wishes to make us understand "a dog's nature, his thoughts, pleasures, and feelings." So we find the first wag is one of "deep love" for his master or other friend; "the great joy wag" is of a like nature, "sure the master is there, well, happy, and loving you"; the "wag of alertness" explains itself, as does the "dream wag," which Jay tells us, however, is very strange and interesting, adding that the "scratch wag" may be considered unimportant, but he thinks "to get a pleasure without hurting any one else, or injuring yourself, is perfectly right, and scratching your back hurts no one and gives you a great happiness."

The next chapter discourses upon the mystery of smell, and also formulates laws for a dog's behavior, ten in all, which Jay thinks will bring peace and happiness to him. These laws are fine from beginning to end, and in most cases could well be observed by the master as well as by the dog. Only the limitations of space prevent giving them in full:

> Be kindly toward all, giving love to a few. * * * Greet all friends with the eyelight of gentleness and smiles * * * and so make the day sunny-warm. * * * Do not bear about with you the rigid tail of suspicion or the back bristles upward, thereby opening many hearts to hatred and misunderstanding. * * * Make friends, for the more you have the greater will be your power and the happier your days. * * * Go about your business with modesty and dignity, but with an erect tail and a sure purpose of doing it well. * * * Eat enough to keep you well, and get some extra good things if you can, but carefully avoid gorging. * * * Seize all the joy you can that robs no other; for happiness is the south wind of the heart's health.

But Mr. Shepard seems to understand his children and love them quite as much as he does animals. The two following chapters contain the thoughts of Barbara, who says she is what she is because of her name:

> It is sad and full of thought; it has many "a's." If you will say slowly "Bar-ba-ra" I am sure you will see that what I say is true. I would have been quite different if my name did not sound so heavy and slow. Betsy is what she is because of her name. She is gay, bright, and full of easily started laughter. Betsy —" Bet" brings smiles and "sy" quiet and merry words. Altogether, she is gay, but not in any way silly, only her mind turns to bright colors, and happiness she sees over everything. * * * I wish I could be Queen of the World, with a right to rule things as I wish. Because horses cannot speak and ask cruel men not to treat them the way they do. Because dog's eyes are so soft and beautiful and follow their masters around, and cannot speak or explain when they try so hard to. Because men put animals in cages to look at—poor things that have always had lots of room and have been kings in their own country. Because so many children are unhappy, and no one helps them to get long days of joy. Because everything is so hard and rough and cruel.

Chapter IV. contains the adventures of Barbara and Frank, a horse, while the rest of this fascinatingly strange book is about equally divided between children and animals. One chapter contains a boy's dream, who, on awakening, remembered he had been a horse for the day. "I was no less a boy, and better, because the dream had come to me." Jay's observations, too, about colors, smells, and moonlight, his antipathies and contempts, gives us a deep insight into the dog nature, while the concluding chapter tells a beautifully idyllic story, "The Heart of a Boy," of which Jay is again the hero, which should win for the book many friends.

Indeed, this is a volume which can never be read with indifference. It will either be cast impatiently aside, as utterly uninteresting, by those for whom it has no message, or be counted as a delightful revelation of the animal nature by its other readers. It would seem that all lovers of "Jungle Books," "Wild Animals I Have Known," and "The Heart of the Ancient Wood," all strangely alike, and yet widely different, would come to be counted among the latter class.

Brooklyn's Municipal Library System.

Brooklyn, it is said, has been slow to demand library privileges. However true this may be, certainly she has not been equally slow in appreciating those privileges when once they were obtained. The Brooklyn Public Library has for its object the development of a municipally controlled institution on the lines of the largest possible free circulation of books, and under the new régime has progressed rapidly. Its municipal control gives to Brooklyn the honor of proclaiming as her own the only municipal library in Greater New York; the Long Island City Library, while being conducted upon the same lines, is much less extensive, and the New York Free Library is still to some extent under corporative control. The definition of a free library, as given by the State Board of Regents, voiced by Mr. Melvil Dewey, is "one owned and controlled by the city."

One year ago last February the library came under municipal authority, and Mr. Arthur E. Bostwick, who was formerly chief librarian of the New York Free Circulating Library, was placed at its head. Mr. Bostwick is a graduate of Yale College and has taken the degree of Ph. D. He is well known in library circles, being extensively affiliated with library interests. He has twice occupied the Presidency of the New York Library Club, and is now President of the Long Island Library Club.

The library is the product of the Brooklyn Public Library Association, the association in turn being the outcome of the interests in free library extension, as upheld and proclaimed by the Woman's Library Association, of which Mrs. Mary E. Craigie was chief pioneer.

At the time of the city's assumption of the library it consisted of the main branch, at 26 Brevoort Place and Bedford Park Branch. Since that time there have been added five branches: Williamsburg, 380 Bedford Avenue; East, 29 Pennsylvania Avenue; South Brooklyn, 1,147 Fourth Avenue, and Flatbush, 5 Caton Avenue, opened as Flatbush Free Library, and transferred to Brooklyn Public Library in January last. The last branch established is Prospect Branch, at Litchfield Mansion, Prospect Park, used at first as a station for traveling library department, and later become of the same character as the other branches. The situation of this branch, which is an important one, is but temporary, the site chosen for its permanent quarters being at Sixth Avenue and Third Street.

Originally the library contained some 20,000 volumes; to-day there are 50,000 volumes. The library's worth is best judged by the city's recent appropriation of $80,000 for its next year. This is twice the amount appropriated last year. To this $20,000, conditionally available, may be added, to be used for maintenance of established free circulating libraries, when they shall be acquired as branches of the Brooklyn Public Library. The libraries alluded to are New Utrecht, Fort Hamilton, Bay Ridge, and Union for Christian Work. This, combined with the establishment of as many new branches as the appropriation will permit, will result for Brooklyn in one of the finest library systems.

Throughout the library the open shelf system prevails, and is considered by the librarian to be the most desirable method, particularly where the borrower's interest is concerned. The loss, in his estimation, which is a natural outcome of such a plan, is in every way compensated for by the actual good accomplished.

At the main branch, which is also the building of administration, there is a most successful children's department, situated on the ground floor. The building is modern in its appointment and most attractive. Each branch, in so far as possible, is conducted, especial requirements of localities being considered, upon the model of the main branch, the children's department included, even when it is only possible to reserve a corner of a room for them.

The Traveling Library Department, which is at the main branch, is under the direction of Mrs. Mary E. Craigie, Assistant Librarian. The privileges of this department for schools, literary clubs, &c., are just beginning to be realized, and will be more used by them as the advantages become known.

It is Mr. Bostwick's object to co-operate more and more, not alone with schools, but with all institutions of learning and progress. It is a matter of encouragement to him that the reception of the library branches has been most enthusiastic, the borrowers being all the time on the increase; and whereas ordinarily in the establishment of a free institution gifts of money, &c., are a proof of progress, the greatest possible evidence for the future success of the library lies in the ability of the people to appreciate their own needs; the consequent demand being best supplied and strengthened by one who, having already been helped by the institution, in turn becomes interested. An actual gift of money from one not appreciative of the library's privileges does not voice to the same extent the people's progress in culture. Mr. Bostwick is an advocate for complete organization in the administration of the library.

The apprentice class in connection with the library, while it is under the control of the librarian, is more directly under the supervision of Miss Theresa Hitchler, the library's chief cataloguer. It is an institution of merit. Six months' free service to the library entitles the applicant, after passing civil service, to take competitive examination for entrance on the force of the Brooklyn Public Library.

Beginning with the main branch, each library will eventually contain an art and a music department. Unity of purpose and determination in pursuit of the highest interest of the institution committed to their charge is upheld to the entire force of the Brooklyn Public Library by its chief librarian.

Aubrey Beardsley's Later Work.*

Last year Mr. Lane published the early work of Beardsley in a massive volume, which, printed on imitation Japan paper, with colored insets, was a notable piece of bookmaking. Now the later work has been published in every way in as sumptuous a manner as the first volume. The cover design which Beardsley intended for his "Venus and Tannhäuser" has also been used on the second volume, as has the title page drawing, which is one of Beardsley's best decorative designs.

The Mlle. de Maupin drawing, an exceedingly beautiful design in color, has been well chosen for the frontispiece. It is reproduced in photogravure, but not in color, though we believe it will be in the special edition of this book to be published soon. The other de Maupin drawings, we agree with Mr. Symons in his essay on Beardsley, show a decided falling off. The illustrations for "Manoa Lescaut," "Madame Bovary," and "La Dame aux Camélias," though rather slight, little wash drawings, quite enter into the spirit of these amorous French romances. All of the "Rape of the Lock," "Savoy," "Volpone," and fragments of the privately printed Lycistrate drawings are also given among the reprinted designs, which also include a number of the "Morte d'Arthur" and "Bon Mots" drawings, book covers, posters, and miscellaneous drawings.

Though but 15 of the 174 drawings are new to Beardsley admirers, a few of these show Beardsley at his best, and make the book invaluable to the collector. The first drawing, "Withered Spring," is rather similar to the one which closes the volume, "Soleil Couchant," (almost exactly like one of the "Morte d'Arthur" drawings given.) Both of these drawings are pretty roughly drawn, but possess a good deal of merit.

Quite different in execution are the drawings of "Dante in Exile" and "The Virgin and Lily." These are quite equal to any of Beardsley's drawings. The ease and repose of the first with the verses make an extremely decorative page. The other, showing the Virgin and Child surrounded by kneeling worshipers, is another beautiful drawing. The posing of the figures is exceedingly well done, and the lower paneling and thin line surrounding the drawing and curving over the top of the drawing rather suggest a stained glass window and a Burne-Jones influence. The portrait of Molière also takes rank with Beardsley's finest work. Molière's dreamy eyes and great shock of hair surrounded by a clever arrangement of light and shade stand out prominently in the picture from his black figure and the black curtain hanging across the picture from top to bottom. One of the two colored plates, "Hermaphrodites," shows a partly draped female figure, the modeling of which is superb and the pose graceful. The delicate tints employed greatly enhance its value. The portrait of Miss Ada Sundberg, a pastel in most violent colors, a design intended for "Lucian's True History," which fortunately was not used, a very good pencil sketch of Dante's head, a characteristic drawing from the frontispiece for the "Sixth Satire of Juvenal," a little sketch, "I Saw Three Ships Sailing By," with no merit, and two designs from the covers of Beardsley's copy of "Tristan und Isolde" with some others, close the list of hitherto unpublished drawings.

Mr. Lane's plan to call the two books "The Early Work" and "The Later Work" was a good one, since two volumes were necessary to include so many of Beardsley's drawings, and he carried out his plan well. The drawings for both volumes were well chosen and are masterpieces of reproductions. We congratulate Mr. Lane in permanently preserving the greatest of all black and white artists' work in sumptuous and perfect form.

A Capable Boston Man.*

As a hero, Quincy Adams Sawyer is the master of all possible situations. He brings down the house when he whistles like a mocking bird, and as to his fighting capabilities, such are his pugilistic accomplishments that in three rounds he knocks the wind out of the village bully. Sawyer is a Boston man, and so nothing less could have been expected of him. He is a gallant man, too, so all the girls in the quiet New England village fall in love with him. He is literary and discovers the talents of Miss Alice Pettingill. There is a very original old gentleman in the romance, who has peculiar ideas on marriage and on the killing of poultry. At the conclusion the author makes every one happy, for there are innumerable marriages. There is one matter in the story which seems by no means necessary, and it is the advertisement of certain new romances to be written, which announcement has little to do with the current incidents of the fiction.

This combination of text and illustration has produced a most noteworthy result.

It would be difficult to approach the discussion of Mr. Ford's text in these volumes without a preliminary note on the form given to it by the publishers. Brought out with the collaboration of the Goupils, of Paris, it is characterized by some of the features adopted in the making of those splendid folios on Queen Elizabeth, Cromwell and Prince Charles Edward Stuart which have challenged admiration for their artistic as well as for their literary qualities. Portraits in colors of Washington and his wife serve as frontispieces for the volumes before us. Many portraits in full page photogravure plates are included, and others, on a smaller scale, appear at chapter endings. Some of the paintings are now reproduced for the first time. Paper and presswork are of the choicest character. COLONIAL DAYS.

Chronicles of ancestors dead and gone possess, in general, interest only for their direct descendants, unless drawn from the lives of historical stars whose lights still shed a radiance down to our own days. But Miss Helen Evertson Smith, in submitting to the public a volume of colonial data gleaned from her own and other family records, invites not alone the sympathy of those who trace kinship with the sturdy settlers in the United States, but of all students of historic lore. In speaking of her long companionship with old papers and her intense interest in family traditions, the author says: "All the persons of whose simple ways of living I have tried to give glimpses seem as familiarly known to me as are the dear relatives through whom so much that concerned their ancestry was transmitted to me. And why should it not be so? The old letters are still pulsing with the inner life of those who have merely stepped beyond the curtain. Their loves, their fears, their hopes, their aspirations, their faiths, their daily occupations—did not these things form the real men and women?" The success of Miss Smith's volume will doubtless arise from the fact that it treats of matrons and maids, fathers and sons, whose energies, patience, and faith laid the foundations of our great Republic, showing them in their home lives or discharging public duties, just as we tread our divers paths to-day. It is the touch of human nature, gracefully depicted, amid statistics of what our forefathers wore or ate and drank, that holds the reader's interest throughout the book. Among thousands of letters and a multitude of manuscripts and diaries, it took a keen tact and fine sense of discrimination to sort out the most pertinent data to give an adequate idea of "Colonial Days and Ways."

Miss Smith is particularly happy in her method of narrative; you feel that her work has been a labor of love, that the brave, capable men and women she tells us about were worthy of time and trouble being expended in transcribing their lives for later generations. Among the amusing incidents in the book is the account of a wedding in 1726. The bridegroom was the Rev. William Worthington, the bride Temperance Gallup, (granddaughter of the pioneer Capt. John Gallup, who had been a man of much influence among the Mohicans.) The friendly Indians had transferred to the son the allegiance they had given the father. The wedding feast was to last two days, and great preparations had been made to cater to the expected guests; long tables were spread with a confusion of meats, fish, side dishes, and vegetables, followed "as an innovation" by a second course of "coffee, pies, puddings, and sweetmeats"; tankards filled with spiced hard cider were passed from hand to hand; also brandy and burgundy. On the first day "the people of quality," the near-by clergymen, and family friends were served; on the second morning the "commonalty" began to assemble at 9 A. M., and tables were served to successive guests until evening. The programme for this day was nearly altered by "a motley but grave and decorous procession of apparently interminable length" that dawned upon the stupefied household's vision. It was the remnant of the Indian tribe that came expecting welcome; brave, squaw, and pappoose. With the prompt decision that characterizes most successful men, Mr. Gallup sprang upon the stone horseblock and proceeded to make an impromptu speech. He assured "his children" that they were welcome, very welcome, but that they had mistaken the day; that the morrow was when they were expected; and on the following day the whole host came back, beplumed and blanketed in their best, and none went hungry or thirsty away." To accomplish this feat, immense iron kettles of clam and fish chowder were cooked out of doors; likewise, wild ducks were stewed with onions; "three young hogs, of about a hundredweight each, were roasted whole, also out of doors," and big bags of Indian meal pudding, thickly studded with dried plums, were cooked in the house, the pudding sauce, made of West Indian molasses, butter, and vinegar, was served by the pailful; great baskets were filled with roast potatoes and bread; barrels of hard cider and rum completed the bill of fare.

This peaceful invasion of the Mohicans was rather a contrast to the former raid of the redskins, in the days when each pioneer built his house with a view to possible attack from their common enemy.

The hardships cheerfully endured by our forebears are carefully noted by Miss Smith. The wind howled through the rafters of the early homestead; the heavy bed hangings were actually necessary to keep out the biting cold; the weekly bath, which was scrupulously taken by every inmate of the house, entailed much trouble in the heating of water in great iron kettles over open fires; church going meant often miles of travel by wagon or on foot, including, in Winter, long hours of sitting in a bitterly cold edifice, the heating of churches being unknown in those times. The colonists also had to depend upon their individual skill to furnish lights, soap, wool, dyes, shoes, clothing, and wooden utensils, besides baking and brewing, and raising their own farm stock for home consumption. Whether it was the thrifty huysvrouw of a Dutch household in New Amsterdam, or a Puritan matron in a New England homestead, or the graceful hostess of a Huguenot home in New Rochelle, the various women administrators in the domestic kingdom, notwithstanding the differences of creed and race, resembled each other in their zealous care of their households, their patient endurance of hardships, their kindly thought for their neighbors, while the fathers and husbands of these women, whether settled north, south, east, or west, were fine types of brave, honorable men, who openly upheld and said their prayers.

Life in a Colonial manor or parsonage was filled with daily duties and simple pleasures, and, despite discomforts and some dangers, our ancestors seemed to get more true enjoyment out of existence than the wear and tear of to-day allows us. Informal dances, parties, and husking bees brought the young people together frequently, and some wore fine imported coats and gowns, others home-made clothes. Tailors were looked down upon in those days, and few took to that trade; consequently customers had to wait the local tailor's pleasure, and the case of a student is recorded who before a new suit was completed had outgrown it. One interesting fact is stated in connection with a literary club that flourished at Sharon, Conn. It was founded in January, 1779, the Rev. Cotton Smith being Chairman. The design of the club was to "promote a taste for the study of Belles Lettres and of Logick, and to gain some skill in the useful freeman's art of debate." The club continued its regular meetings from January, 1779, to May, 1780, when a "Miscellany" under the name of "Clio" was started. To its columns each club member was expected to make at least one contribution in every second or third number. The club, it appears, continued in active operation for twenty years or more. Miss Smith affirms that hitherto it has been believed that the first purely literary club was the one started by Mrs. Lydia H. Sigourney in Hartford, Conn.; in the early years of this century, and adds that, until some other claimant arises, she will give Sharon the honor of being the mother of literary clubs in the United States. Among the notable personalities who live again in the pages of "Colonial Days and Ways" is the Rev. Cotton Mather Smith, whose fame as an eloquent preacher was outlived by the remembrance of his pastoral work. During an awful smallpox Winter, in intensely bitter weather, he and his heroic wife banished themselves from their home for three months, living in an outhouse, so that they could minister to the sick and dying without endangering their neighbors or family. An amusing incident is related in connection with a mischievous boy whom the pastor befriended. For some fault the lad had been forbidden to attend service on Sunday. While the sermon was in progress a general chuckle crept through the congregation. The preacher stopped and looked around as the commotion increased; every one was looking in his direction, yet not at him. An old slave who solved the mystery, stepped from the topmost gallery upon the top of the sounding-board hanging over the pulpit and picked up a pet black and tan dog, which the boy in punishment had decorated with a pair of the parson's best bands and sent off to church. The dog had reached the sounding-board and gravely seated himself over the head of his unconscious master.

In the closing chapter of Miss Smith's delightful book she relates how the same parson on a certain Sunday in late October, 1777, preached a wonderful sermon on the text, "Watch, what of the night? The watchman saith the morning cometh." He spoke as if inspired, picturing an oppressed people struggling for liberty against fearful odds, speaking of late reverses until his congregation was in tears. Then suddenly his tone changed. "Our weakness," he said, "is the Lord's opportunity. * * * He has promised to succor those who look to Him for their help. He is faithful who has promised. * * * Behold the morning now cometh. I see its beams already gilding the mountain tops; its brightness is already bursting over all the land." He closed his Bible and stood with uplifted hand. Then, during the silence following, fell a hasty clatter of horse's hoofs. Reaching the church door, anxious eyes watch the rider as, dismounting, he hurries inside, his spurs clanking on the uncarpeted floor and up the pulpit stairs. The parson, flushed with the joy of a hope fulfilled, read out these words: "Burgoyne has surrendered!" and "then burst into honorable tears." The next moment he and his whole congregation joined in a prayer of thankfulness.

*COLONIAL DAYS AND WAYS. By Helen Evertson Smith. New York: The Century Company. $2.50.

Mr. Frederic H. Sawyer, a well-known Englishman, has just written a book entitled "The Inhabitants of the Philippines," in which he declares that the Filipinos fight much fairer than the Boers, while their treatment of prisoners of war, both Spanish and American, has every evidence of humanity. The author, who, as a civil engineer, has had a great many years' experience in traveling through the Philippines, has had exceptional opportunities of observing the native life and character. Although he stands up for the Filipino reputation, he does not advise the Americans to withdraw from the islands. He draws up a plan of reconciling American supremacy with native autonomy and recommends it to President McKinley's consideration. Considerable space in the book is devoted to the religious character and prejudice of the natives, which should be found of value to missionaries engaged in work in the Philippines. The book will be published in London by Sampson, Low & Co., and whether it will be presented in an American edition depends upon the outcome of negotiations that are now being carried on with a well-known New York house.

RUSSIA AGAINST INDIA.

The name of the author of the book "Russia Against India," Archibald R. Colquhoun, is so well known as that of a writer on the Far East that he needs no special introduction. But he must be defined as among those observers who have resided and traveled in the East and acted as correspondents for the press, who feel that the Home Government of the British Empire lacks vigor and initiative, and is not only losing its trade but its prestige and its preponderance in Asiatic affairs.

This book deals specifically with what to the party to which our author belongs seems the greatest menace to England's power in the East, namely, the progress Russia is making toward the occupation of Asia, and, more specifically still, toward the conquest of India at an early day. Through the blindness of England to her designs and her failure to arrest Russia's progress at a frontier now available, namely, Afghanistan, which if taken and held might defeat the persistent scheme of Russia, and which, if now lost to her, can never be regained, India is to be lost in the not distant future

Travelers and those whose occupation is writing for the public often feel the influence of local events and hear opinions expressed which alarm them. Being on the spot is sometimes a disadvantage, because while personal observation may be essential in matters of detail, in large matters, involving the affairs of two Governments at the outset and of two continents at the conclusion, the view of the trained statesman which embraces the whole problem is the important one.

The book before us is a strenuous assertion that Russia, having now occupied all Central Asia, is at the border of Afghanistan, awaiting a favorable moment to occupy it, and thus become a neighbor of India, which could be taken into its net at some other favorable moment.

In addition to this danger, Russia, having completed the Trans-Caspian Railway along the northern border of Persia to Kushk, is ready to push southward to the Indian Ocean at some moment when England's hands are tied, possessing herself of Beloochistan or of Eastern Persia, and thus commanding the Indian Ocean. This is only a step toward the far greater goal of acquiring all Asia Minor, and toward the final end of all her schemes, the possession of Constantinople, the ancient seat of her faith, and then the occupation of the ancient seats of civilization, and, of course, taking up both the holy cities of Western orthodoxy, destroying Zionism and Romanism at one blow.

While this southing is going on, the eastward tendency is not to be neglected. Russia, in addition to bridging Siberia from the Atlantic waters to the Pacific, will extend her Central Asian line from Andijan, in Eastern Turkestan, its present terminus, through Chinese Thibet, till it reaches the Yangtse River, that river sacred to British trade, and takes away that trade through the back door.

These are large projects, and remind one, somehow, of the real estate advertisements at Omaha a few years since, when the maps of city lots about Omaha left very little land in Nebraska for the plow.

However, Mr. Colquhoun is very strenuous about it, and in this volume makes out his case with little reference to the real strength of the British Empire—which he wishes to rouse from its Ministerial and Governmental apathy.

To writers of his habit Russia is always the Northern Colossus or the Russian Bear or some other metaphorical and imaginary being. This Colossus "is more Oriental than European," though there is not a particle of Oriental blood in the Russian veins. Russians have no more Oriental tastes than Britons, nor any worse habits; and as for sympathies the case is probably about even. Russia is always personified by writers of this party; it has a continuous mind, a definite deep design, and has a hunger for land that surpasses anything known in Britain, though there is not a particle of evidence that Russia wants India or ever had any designs upon it.

People who write such conventional and surface sketches as this volume contains about the history and development of Russia never remember, if they ever knew, that Russia's growth is the development of a race under territorial conditions almost as free as in the United States; that this is both a natural and an inevitable process for which no forged will of Peter the Great, no Minister or Government, nor any Bear is responsible.

A power expanding is always an unwelcome spectacle to its neighbors. But when that power builds for the uses of the civilized world a Siberian Railway, at a cost which strains every financial nerve, we ought to say our thanks. When that power rescues what was once the garden of the world, Central Asia, now arid and nearly peopleless, from its fate, and puts a railroad through it, with the fair design of another way out to the future scene of the world's greatest activities—the Pacific—we ought again to say our thanks.

And if England will not build the railway which is feasible, connecting the Mediterranean with not only the Indian Ocean but with India, Siam, and China, along the lower shores of Asia, we hope Russia will. England would be the chief gainer by it.

Our author's book is largely made up of an account of the tribes of Central Asia, not very pertinent to his subject or of much value, and of the Russian conquest of those provinces, correct enough, but not complete enough to be valuable to the student, lay or military.

The idea of the conquest of India is not a new one. It has been discussed for a generation, and was as well understood twenty years ago as it is now. Its consummation is much less likely than even ten years ago. The reasons for this opinion are many, but they are simple. India is not the India of a generation ago. The steps taken to insure her loyalty to England are not alone military. They are the wise administrative measures taken in India for her benefit, which, while not doing away with all private dissent, are working a mighty change in India. These are principally the great railway system, the water supply for private use and irrigation on a large scale, the extensive sanitary measures, and the development of those object lessons in cultivation, manufactures, economics, and schools which lead India on to her great future.

Russia could not pose as India's "deliverer." The character of her administration is now understood. England's will be preferred.

The last ten years have witnessed a marvelous unification of the British Empire, so that to-day instead of England's being in a decline, near her end, as has been said, she is an empire with a united front, not to be lightly reckoned with.

And we can forecast that the navy of Great Britain would find Russia more vulnerable than she now is if she appears at a port on the Indian Ocean, as she is already at Vladivostock and Port Arthur; that, in a word, Ruasia becomes more and more vulnerable by as much more as she extends her lines. Besides, her finances are already strained to the breaking point, and without money there can be no war with England.

The other consideration is the play of National politics in Europe—a game in which "check" may be called on a dozen different gambits. All the European nations, instead of England alone, are now interested in the future of the Pacific and Indian Oceans, and the future of Russian expansion will not depend upon England but upon the will of the whole of Europe and of the United States.

GEORGE H. WARNER.

Mark Twain at the Aldine Club.

The reception and dinner which the Aldine Association gave to Mark Twain on Dec. 4 was the most notable event of the kind that has ever taken place at that club. Although one of the stormiest nights of the season, the rooms of the club were thronged at an early hour, and the large dining room became so inadequate that some forty persons had to be seated in an adjoining apartment, whence they emerged with their chairs when the speaking began.

The occasion was also notable for the men who were present. Among these were Bishop Potter, Joseph Jefferson, F. Hopkinson Smith, James W. Alexander, John Fox, Jr., Winston Churchill, Brander Matthews, Richard Watson Gilder, John Kendrick Bangs, Albert Shaw, Robert Bridges, Clarence C. Buel, George Haven Putnam, Charles Scribner, George P. Brett, Arthur H. Scribner, Frank H. Scott, Edward Bok, William W. Ellsworth, Frank N. Doubleday, Col. G. B. M. Harvey, Major James B. Pond, Robert W. Smith, Winfield S. Moody, Fletcher H. Bangs, Ernest D. North, Charles F. Chichester, Laurence Hutton, Hamilton W. Mable, Henry Loomis Nelson, F. A. Deneke, Augustus Thomas, Capt. Joshua Slocum, David A. Munro, and Francis W. Halsey. The speeches were made by Bishop Potter, Joseph Jefferson, Mark Twain, James W. Alexander, George Haven Putnam, Capt. Slocum, John Kendrick Bangs, John Fox, Jr., and Augustus Thomas.

The dinner was remarkable for the decorations of the rooms. These had been arranged by Alexander W. Drake. Mr. Clemens and Mr. Mable, the toastmaster, were framed in by a pilothouse, from the corners of which were suspended colored lights and the cornice of which bore the name of Alonzo Child, the name of one of the steamboats which Mr. Clemens used to pilot on the Mississippi River. The walls were festooned with hanging moss, and here and there were suspended oranges, gourds, and other Southern growths, while catfish were sailing about in aquariums.

Mr. Clemens found in these decorations the principal themes for his speech, which was reminiscent and constantly delightful. When the dinner was first arranged, an understanding was entered into with Mr. Clemens that the speeches should not be reported. He felt that the public tributes already paid to him fully supplied the public needs. The committee, while differing from him, respected his wishes, and THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW must do the same.

A Guide to Artistic Paris.*

In the preface to his two volumes on Paris the late Grant Allen says his object is not to direct the stranger through its streets and boulevards, nor yet to give him practical information about hotels, cab fares, tramways, or other every-day conveniences, but rather to supply for those tourists who travel as a means to culture a guide to and an adequate description of the artistic sights and scenes of the French capital. He writes:

The general plan pursued will be somewhat as follows: First will come the inquiry why the town ever gathered together at all at that particular spot. * * * Next * * * why the town grew to social or political importance, and what were the stages by which it assumed its present shape. Thirdly, why it gave rise to that higher form of handicraft which we know as Art, and toward what particular arts it especially gravitated. After that we will take in detail the various strata of its growth or development, examining the buildings, and works of art which they contain, in historical order, and tracing the causes which led to their evolution.

Following this plan the volumes are most comprehensive in their scope and include in their pages nearly all that can possibly interest the educated visitor to Paris. Beginning with the Ile de la Cité as the nucleus about which the city has been built, Mr. Allen follows the growth of Paris step by step, telling the story of its development and repeating many of the legends which have been handed down for years immemorial and are even still accepted.

With a careful study of this edition the visitor is not likely to overlook much of artistic merit to be seen in the French capital. Notre Dame has its history sketched from its beginning to the present day, and Mr. Allen's book becomes a perfect guide to all of its points of interest. But it is in the Louvre that he lingers longest and with most apparent delight. Here he repeats not only his own judgment, but that of most of the best critics upon the sculpture and paintings exhibited.

The volumes are artistically bound in a pretty shade of green cloth, lettered in gold and bearing on their covers a golden shield upon which is pictured a dark blue and white ship at full sail. There are eighty-two illustrations, many of which are reproductions of the best pictures in the Louvre, while others represent specimens of famous and beautiful architecture.

Gen. Shields.*

Gen. James Shields was one of the notable Irishmen who have given their strength and ability to the service of the United States. His biography calls him the greatest Irishman who ever trod American soil, yet during his army lifetime and the score of years that have elapsed since his death there has not appeared any biography till now.

The author of the volume before us is the Hon. William H. Condon, who disclaims any pretensions to literary ability, but undertakes to narrate impartially the story of his hero's life. That he has put into the work a good measure of that Celtic impetuosity and enthusiasm that helped to make the subject of his memoir a brilliant soldier is perhaps no detriment to it. The loyalty of a sincere admirer may not suggest infallibility of judgment in mere detail, and yet may present on the whole a more spirited and lifelike portrait than a mere analyst could give.

We learn that Gen. Shields came of a fighting Irish family. Behind him were Athlone and the siege of Limerick and the battle of the Boyne, and before him Cerro Gordo and Chapultepec and Winchester. While a boy at Athlone he showed an early predilection for military pursuits, one of his precocious exploits being the marshaling of a company of young companions to do battle with a neighboring contingent, and routing his opponents by a bayonet charge. The leader of the opposing forces at the time was afterward known to the world as Commander McVeigh. A duel, or rather an attempted duel, is also among the events of that early period. Acquaintance with an old soldier put him in the way of becoming an accomplished swordsman, and from him he procured books that gave him his first idea of military science.

Some years later, when young Shields was in America, and subjected to the active animosity and ridicule of some of his neighbors, he nearly engaged in a conflict which, if persisted in, might have resulted disastrously to the American people. The challenge was out and accepted; the weapons chosen—swords—put his adversary at a decided disadvantage, though he had a longer reach and exceedingly vigorous muscles. The name of Shields's opponent on this occasion was Abraham Lincoln, whose gallantry in trying to protect Miss Todd from the consequences of a very immature letter that she had written, by taking the blame of authorship upon himself, nearly involved him in a battle for which Shields was probably better fitted. The cause being removed by judicious action on the part of the seconds, peace was restored.

Entering with all his natural activity into political life, the subject of the biography served in various offices, and in a comparatively short time became Auditor of the State of Illinois. At the end of two years he was appointed by the Governor to the position of Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, from which Stephen A. Douglas had resigned. Abraham Lincoln, John D. Palmer, Lyman Trumbull, and a score of other well-known men practiced at the Illinois bar while he was upon the bench. He resigned his office to accept from President Polk that of Commissioner General of the Land Office at Washington.

"The language of Shields's resignation as Land Commissioner proclaims the soldier," says his biographer. On July 1, 1846, he received his appointment as Brigadier General, serving successively under Gens. Taylor, Wool, and Scott. He commanded the First Brigade. There were incidents in the Mexican campaign that were both brave and romantic, chivalric, and soldierly; a limited review will not afford space for them. The author gives much space and care to the narration of the battle of Winchester, during the civil war, in which the Mexican veteran was pitted against Stonewall Jackson and succeeded in wringing a victory from that redoubtable warrior. Jackson falling back from Winchester toward Staunton, simultaneously with Johnston's retreat from Manassas, was followed by Shields till the Confederate force was within fifty miles of Johnston, when Shields, by the ruse of a retreat, drew Jackson back to Winchester. Shields posted the greater part of his command in hiding about two miles from Winchester. A skirmish between the ostensible rear guard of the Union force and the Confederate cavalry, but with no decisive result, occurred on the evening of March 22. Following this, Gen. Banks, confident that Jackson would not venture to attack again, withdrew to go to Washington, but Shields waited, and had the satisfaction of defeating his very able adversary. There is nothing in the account which pretends to add new evidence to the story of that fight as told in various reports and histories. The author has collected that which has already been made public, and offers no new analysis, but there is no uncertain note in his condemnation of the injustice by which Gen. Shields was practically suspended from his command soon afterward, nor can any reader be uncertain regarding his estimate of Secretary Stanton.

Throughout the book there are interspersed sketches of other eminent men whose lives were in touch at various times with that of Gen. Shields. There are also added to the narrative proper a goodly collection of speeches and addresses which were delivered by the hero from time to time. The sub-title of the book is the descriptive line, "Hero of Three Wars and Senator from Three States," the States being Illinois, Minnesota, and California. The book, which is illustrated, is printed by the Blakely Printing Company's Press, Chicago.

The January number of The Critic will inaugurate the beginning of its third decade. The appearance of the periodical will be somewhat changed, as the pages hereafter will each have two columns instead of one. The principal feature of the number will perhaps be the "Letters of Congratulation" sent in from many literary sources. An elaborate review of Mr. Howells's literary recollections will also form an appropriate feature. There will be an article by Gen. Stanley Lee and the young Japanese writer, Adachi Kinnosuké, will review Hearn's "Shadowings." Mr. Christian Brinton has a paper on Whistler, his idiosyncrasies and his genius, with a curious caricature by Ernest Haskell.

An important folio of plates for artists' work is being published by Longmans, Green & Co. It is entitled "Living Anatomy," by Cecil L. Burns, R. B. A., and Robert I. Colenso, M. A., M. D. The pictures are the reproductions of photographs of models in various positions, over which an artist has drawn the muscles to which, in drawing or painting, it is necessary to give prominence.

HINTS FROM THE MAIL BAG.

Stedman's "Anthology."

GEORGIA CLAY, New York City, thinks Mr. Joseph Jacob, in his article on Mr. E. C. Stedman's "An American Anthology" in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Nov. 24, has made some assertions, which, she says, "cannot fail to evoke criticism." It is very evident that Mr. Jacobs has not given the 'Anthology' an exhaustive reading, and certainly his spirit was not in touch with that which compiled such a work. Mr. Stedman has not compared English and American poetry, but has simply shown the progress of our country during the past century, and the idea advanced by Mr. Jacobs that individuality is lacking in anything American is laughable in its absurdity. If he will inquire in editorial sanctums, he will find, too, that the 'hymnal' meter is rarely accepted, and that the oddity of any verse is its first recommendation, provided the thought be worth the effort.

"He is also mistaken in thinking that Mr. Stedman lowered his standard in his late work—on the contrary, he has merely striven to be just, and to give credit to those nameless singers who once or twice in their lives may have reached the heights. Mr. Jacobs forgets that our American dialects, in themselves, give individuality to each State. We have Bret Harte, Will Carleton, Frank Stanton, Howard Weeden, and Paul Lawrence Dunbar. Are they not individual—would any one call their poetry 'English,' except that it is clothed in dialect forms or that language?

"Poe alone would refute his entire argument, and this he remembers at the last moment, just before he 'finishes' poor Longfellow, in true pugilistic 'knockout' style.

"Finally he sums up in one tremendous 'left-hander,' aimed at Mr. Stedman: 'The moral of it all is that there is no such thing as American poetry.'"

On this same subject ALLAN C. HAMILTON, also of New York City, writes: "Mr. Jacobs has apparently mistaken the main object of the book. The very fact that songs like 'Home, Sweet Home' and 'Life on the Ocean Wave' are well known, and yet not well known as American productions, would illustrate the necessity of emphasizing the position that American poetry and poets occupy in the literature of the world.

"A defense of the poets unmentioned by the critic I leave in the hands of more able brethren of the pen—and no doubt these will not be backward, but a few self-contradicted remarks in the article may be touched on here. Mr. Jacobs objects to the absence of the 'American' note, and in the same breath mentions descriptions of American scenery, fauna, and flora in the poems; and then throws in a slight reference to our dialect poems, which 'have the stamping of their locality and race tolerably evident.' It is not the present object to dilate on our dialect poets, but to inquire if Mr. Jacobs—being an Englishman—is capable of judging these essentially American writers, whether favorably or not?

"The term poetry is universal; as for American poetry, there is none, any more than there is English poetry. There is poetry written in Anglo-Saxon by American and English poets; and none of the American singers is trying to break away from the 'general tradition of English poetry'—though they are blamed for not doing so in an earlier part of the same article. The special object of the 'Anthology' is intended to show the progress of poetry in America—and to combine it with the 'Victorian Anthology' would not accomplish this; for, close as we are bound to English literature by tradition and our common language, America is not part of England, and American writers must stand on their own merits."

GEORGE TURNER, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "While recently reading 'An American Anthology,' I accidentally discovered the absence of the name and the work of John Godfrey Saxe! This being more than a typographical error and more than a carping critic's discovery of the omission of an author he admires but who is not popular even with the magazines, I write to inquire if you have noted the omission and knew the reason therefor? The preface tells us of an American poet now living abroad (who is he, I wonder?) who declined the honor of appearing in the 'Anthology,' but the genial Saxe is yet further abroad these dozen years and more, so it does not apply to him."

"Sentimental Tommy" and "Tom Sawyer."

KATHARINE HILLARD writes: "Just now, when 'Sentimental Tommy' has been fairly installed as one of the immortals, it is interesting to compare his tricks and his manners with those of his illustrious predecessor, Thomas Sawyer, Esq. In two passages of 'Tom Sawyer' are the resemblances between the two characters peculiarly striking. I have no idea of insinuating that Mr. Barrie is in any sense of the word a plagiarist, but these coincidences are at least to be numbered among the curiosities of literature. Could anything be more like 'Sentimental Tommy' than Tom Sawyer's behavior when he had been (for once unjustly) punished by his aunt, and knew she was longing to make it up with him, but refused to recognize her tearful glances. 'He pictured himself lying sick unto death and his aunt bending over him beseeching one little forgiving word, but he would turn his face to the wall and die with that word unsaid. Ah, how would she feel then?' And as he thinks of himself as drowned, and carried home to her cold and white, 'he so worked upon his feelings with the pathos of these dreams that he had to keep swallowing, he was so like to choke.'

"The other passage is where he and Joe Harper do the Robin Hood business. 'The blast of a toy tin trumpet came faintly down the green aisles of the forest. Tom flung off his jacket and trousers, turned a suspender into a belt, raked away some brush behind a rotten log, disclosing a rude bow and arrow, a lath sword, and a tin trumpet, and in a moment had seized these things and bounded away, barelegged, with fluttering shirt. He presently halted under a great elm, blew an answering blast, and then began to tiptoe and look warily out, this way and that. He said, cautiously, to an imaginary company:

"'Hold, my merry men! Keep hid till I blow.'

"Now appeared Joe Harper, as airily clad and elaborately armed as Tom. Tom called:

"'Hold! Who comes here into Sherwood Forest without my pass?'

"'Guy of Guisborne wants no man's pass. Who art thou that—that—'

"'Dares to hold such language,' said Tom, prompting—for they talked 'by the book,' from memory. And then followed a terrific combat, with appropriate language, ending in the (perfunctory) death of Robin Hood, who would have made a splendid end had he not fallen back upon a nettle and sprung up too gayly for a corpse. So that we can say that even if Mark Twain's Tommy is like a pencil sketch beside Mr. Barrie's oil painting of his Tommy, at least the pencil sketch came first—so long before, in fact, that the ungrateful world has half forgotten it."

Long Words and Sentences.

S. E. F., Baltimore, Md., writes: "In THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Nov. 24 M. F. L., anent 'honorificabilitudinity,' says: 'I have seen the word in the form under discussion in an old burlesque English comedy, but am unable to find it now.' I wonder if the writer was not thinking of Costard's honorificabilitudinitatibus. (Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost,' Act V., Scene I.) One should not paint the lily, but Costard could have scored a greater lesquipedalian success by saying honorificabilitidinitatibusque.

"In my boyhood they used to have me spell transmagnificandubandandeceality. Does any one know whether this monster also has a literary setting?"

H. W. BEALL, New York, writes: "The example of long sentences quoted in THE SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 8, from Hubbard's 'Indian Wars,' is long simply because it is badly constructed. By rearranging and leaving out periods the whole of Macaulay's history could be made one sentence on the style of Mr. Hubbard's."

Some Refreshing Books.

"E. B. G.," New York, writes: "In THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Nov. 10 it was suggested that the readers of THE SATURDAY REVIEW should fill a shelf of 'refreshing books,' on which your correspondent placed Mrs. Seton-Thompson's 'A Woman Tenderfoot.' Among recent nature studies there is one that seems to me to stand alone and pre-eminent, 'The Heart of the Ancient Wood,' by Prof. Charles G. D. Roberts. The book is steeped in the charm and mystery of the primeval forest, and through its rhythmic lines one seems to hear the beating of Nature's heart. It is a story that none but a poet could have written. Though it tells of the lives of animals, it is not—like so many animal stories—mere glorified natural history; it shows the wood folk in sympathetic relation with humanity in the person of Miranda, and on almost every page are touches of tender human sympathy, flashes of poetic intuition, and haunting phrases.

"The special charm of this book lies in its delightful story of how Miranda made friends with the furry dwellers in the wilderness. The giant she-bear, Kroof, the companion and protector of Miranda, is an animal unique in fiction. She is far more real than the animals of Kipling, because there is nothing impossible in her relation with Miranda; one feels that she 'might have happened.'

"It is impossible in a brief letter to more than touch upon this story here and there, to refer to the beauty of its style, its pervading, though never-mentioned, symbolism, and the strong and human love story which grows out of the meeting of the child-woman, Miranda, with the young hunter and trapper, Dave—the natural enemy of all her friends among the furtive folk. The battle in the heart of Miranda between her growing love for Dave and her loyalty to the animals whose kindred have been his prey, forms the latter half of one of the most charming idylls in our language. And then the beauty and the pathos of its happy ending! It is safe to say that the most hardened novel reader will lay aside this book with moist, though smiling, eyes."

JANE MARSH PARKER, Detroit, Mich., says: "First of all on that shelf will be Lewis Carroll's 'Rhyme and Reason,' with the delicious nonsense of 'The Hunting of the Shark: An Agony in Eight Fits.' The sixty-five unique illustrations will 'rest tired hearts' when all else fails. Then E. S. Martin's 'Windfalls of Observation,' (and anything he has published in book form,) must have room—and 'Dreamthorpe'—certainly—by Alexander Smith. Ah! there is a soothing poultice for a tired heart. 'The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table,' Mr. Dooley in any shape, and Austin Dobson's verses. That's my ordinary diet for any temporary disarrangement of psychic digestion—sometimes varied with bound volumes of Life. The 'Best Things from Punch,' recently issued, would be an invaluable addition to the 'shelf of refreshing.' Turning over the pages of the early volumes of The Atlantic Monthly and browsing lazily is what one tired out heart that I know always does when she wants a soul tonic—a sure brace for mental exhaustion."

Senator Davis as an Author.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON, whose name has recently been much before the public as the author of "Senator North," writes: "It is not known to the public generally that the late Senator Davis wrote and had printed and bound two monographs of remarkable merit and interest, one on Hamlet, the other on Mme. Roland. Both were the result of deep thought and study, enriched by fancy, and written with the distinction of style which marked all that he wrote. It is to be hoped that Mrs. Davis will now publish these studies, and give the world an opportunity to judge for itself of a literary gift known so far only to few. I doubt also if his lectures on international law have been published. Although the subject is not ordinarily one of great fascination to the general reader, I have read them more than once, so delightful could Mr. Davis make any subject by his charm of style and the play of his fancy. The only possible fault is a touch of rhetoric here and there, but this he once explained to me was a tribute to the younger minds who attended his lectures. In the statesman we lost a man of letters who unquestionably would have left an enduring name, but statesmanship is of so much greater importance than letters that we have no right to complain. Still, as no one appreciated his literary abilities more than his wife did, I am sure that their publication is only a question of time."

The Origin of Lucretius's Madness.

J. L. ELDRIDGE, Rensselaer, N. Y., calls attention to a slight error in Mr. Ferris Greenslet's article on Lucretius, published in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW. He writes: "We do not, as he states, derive our information as to the alleged madness and death of the poet from St. Jerome, but from Eusebius, who, in his 'Chronicon,' relates the circumstance in the following terms: 'Having been driven to madness by an amatory potion, and having composed several books in the intervals of his insanity, which Cicero afterward corrected, he died by his own hand in the forty-fourth year of his age.'

"St. Jerome (Epist. Dissuas. ad Rufinum) speaks of a woman named Lucilia who drove her husband mad by giving him a love philter. Some writers have conjectured that the cases are identical, but proof is wanting."

"Hamlet" and "L'Aiglon."

MADGE EVERETT, New York City, after witnessing the Bernhardt-Coquelin company in its presentation of "L'Aiglon," writes: "Verily does Francis Charles, Duke of Reichstadt, in his black garb, resemble another dreamer in suit of sable, another hesitating non-doer of planned deeds, and that other a certain Hamlet, Prince of Denmark; each of royal birth and heir to a throne, which a relentless fate forbids his mounting; each the son of an unworthy mother, and the adorer of a dead father; both unhappy in their royal cages; Hamlet pining to avenge his father's foul death, Francis burning for revenge upon the conquerors who sent his father into exile.

"Beside the horror of Hamlet's misery, the shame, the doubt, the revenge that spelt the murder of his mother's husband, the unhappiness of Francis is almost as naught. But to himself it is none the less real. He is also a mere youth, a stripling, too weak for a grief so shameful as that of Hamlet.

"At this point of contrast the parallel lines widen, as do they also in the tenor of the love shown the dead parent. Hamlet's affection is more than filial; it is love based upon esteem for the King's virtues, upon a recognition of the good and noble, as well as kingly qualities in his father. Not so with the Duke of Reichstadt. His reverence, his admiration, his passion, are for the fighter, the conqueror, the Emperor. Enthusiasm may sweep the onlooker away upon its imaginative tide, but reason will logically maintain that it is not Napoleon his father, but Napoleon the Spirit of Battles, at whose shrine Charles Francis worships, with Flambeau as faithful acolyte.

"Each of the two plays under consideration has a touch of the supernatural. To both dreamers appear the spirits of the dead; to the Dane a ghost crying for revenge, to the French boy a host of voices and shadowy forms calling and beckoning for his life, as expiation for their countless unnamed graves."

Onward, Christian Soldiers!

W. H. DANIELL, Madison, Conn., writes: "On Page 905 of THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW is an article copied from The Boston Watchman wherein the Rev. James H. Ross gives information regarding the hymn, 'Onward, Christian Soldiers,' which received such a magnificent setting from Arthur Sullivan. Mr. Ross states that 'it was first published in 1885 in The Church Times, an organ of the Church of England.' In 1870 I was choirmaster of the Church of the Advent, Boston, and made frequent use of this hymn to the setting by Dr. Dykes. In 1875, being then choirmaster of All Saints' Memorial Church, Providence, R. I., I made frequent use of the hymn to Sullivan's setting. Also I have a copy of 'Hymns, Ancient and Modern,' published by E. P. Dutton & Co. of New York in 1871, where Hymn 385 will be found to be the one in question."

First Editions.

SILVANUS J. MACY, Avon, N. Y., referring to Mr. John D. Champlin's article on "First Editions" in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 1, writes: "I trust publishers will establish what should constitute an edition numerically, excepting, of course, special editions, such as édition de luxe, &c. I notice an advertisement of 'The Master Christian,' which contains the following: 'First edition (for America and England) 150,000, probably the largest first edition of a novel ever printed.' Publishers might adopt the plan of stating first edition of 1,000, 10,000, or 100,000, as the case may be. I would call attention to another matter for the consideration of publishers, and that is that the date of publication should be on the title page. I have in my library several books in which the date of publication is omitted."

Another "Best Book."

D. I. G., New York, writes: "Your issue of THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 8 was, to say the least, a remarkable one, and will certainly gain for you the esteem and gratitude of those of your fellow-townsmen who are interested in contemporary literature. Your list of the one hundred best books of the season was an especially welcome feature. However, in reading over the fiction portion of it I was surprised and disappointed, as I presume most serious readers of fiction will be, to find no mention of Mr. Zangwill's new novel. Without going into a controversy as to the merits of 'The Mantle of Elijah,' it would seem that its author's position in the world of letters would entitle a new book by him to be placed in a list giving what is purported to be the best twenty-seven novels of the season."

A Flaw in Our Republicanism.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

A single sentence in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW suggests a criticism that may appear trivial if considered only in connection with the case in point, but the principle involved has a wide and important application. Your announcement of a forthcoming book to be published on both sides of the Atlantic describes it as the love letters of an unknown girl that "poured forth her soul," &c., in a wonderful manner, and that "it is quite certain that she came of a distinguished family." This at once raises in my mind the blunt question, "What of it?" Are the passions of love and the sufferings and sacrifices that sometimes accompany it essentially different with a member of a distinguished family from the same things when experienced by a member of a family that is not distinguished? If the English publisher can appeal more powerfully to his public by assuring them that the strictly anonymous heroine came of a distinguished family, let him do so. But when the same consideration is presented to American readers, it appears to assume that there is something un-American in American sentiment and sympathy. If our fellow-citizens who come suddenly into possession of great wealth must continue to spend some of their millions in buying rubbishy titles for their daughters, there is no help for it. They satirize themselves by never marrying their sons to daughters of titled families. But we ought at least to keep out of American literature and American criticism everything that is so un-American as to be anti-American. The number of our readers has increased enormously in the past few years, and most of them need some guidance. It is the short, critical paragraphs that are read, not the long reviews, and the writers of such paragraphs would do well to realize what a powerful influence they may exert.

Modern Dutch Art.*

The editor of this collection does well to lead off with Anton Mauve. None of the other Dutch artists represented has the same delicate distinction and poetic insight. The score or so of illustrations from his work are sufficient to show his narrow range, his melancholy temperament, his discriminating vision, and his uncertain hand. Those unfamiliar with his personal history will not be surprised to learn from the rather trivial biographical study accompanying the pictures that he was subject to fits of extreme depression, balanced by periods of high spirits; that until the last five years of his life, when he came under the influence of Millet—whom he called "the sculptor Millet"—he was careless alike of anatomical construction and of modeling; that he rebelled against masters, and that he was a rapid worker.

Twelve of the nineteenth century painters of Holland are noticed in the present volume most of them little known to the American public. The text is by different writers, but is characterized by a uniformly light and airy familiarity not altogether in harmony with the serious directness of the Dutch art. It is startling, for example, to find the biographer of Gerke Henkes, whose grave and beautiful picture "The Philosopher" is reproduced in photogravure, announcing at the start his intention of revenging himself upon Henkes for having galloped him about the garden before he was old enough to talk at a pace that left him no breath for screaming. "I mean to tip him unceremoniously out of his cradle," says the author, "shake up his brains, and hold him up to the world to be gazed at from every point of view. Let him protest as much as he likes, let him kick and try to scream, for I will take good care that he cannot, for his lungs shall also be emptied of the necessary air, he, too, will be forced to silence." All of which promises the reader an excitement that is not forthcoming, the subsequent article being writ in ink from which the gall is left out, and presenting Henkes as a mild-mannered, obstinate, hard-working painter leading the most uneventful of lives.

The two hundred and odd illustrations are what give the book a value, but the text, where it cannot be ignored, is at least amusing.

The Delineator for 1901.

Those features which of late have been more than usually prominent in The Delineator—fiction, special illustrated articles, and literary papers—will be more than ever conspicuous in the columns of this periodical during the coming year. The distinct field, however, covered by The Delineator, that of fashions, will be interpreted in the usual interesting and up-to-date manner, but with renewed energy, owing to the recent establishment of London and Paris bureaus of correspondence. Among the authors whose stories will appear in the early numbers of 1901 are Mary Hartwell Catherwood, Francis Lynde, Charles G. D. Roberts, Elmore Elliott Peake, Mrs. Schuyler Crowninshield, Grace Marguerite Hurd, and others. There will be special illustrated articles by Mrs. Leland Stanford, Miss Helen Gould, and the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, while a series entitled "The Pageants of Cities Series," will be contributed to as follows: "Paris," by Eliot Gregory; "London," Sir Walter Besant; "Florence," Edith R. Cresby, and "Moscow," George Kennan. The series called "Stories of Authors' Loves" will include "Charlotte Brontë," "Dante Gabriel Rossetti," and "Charles Dickens," while a series of papers on "Child Life" will be contributed by Dr. Grace Peckham Murray.

A Revelation in Book Making

Monsieur Beaucaire

By BOOTH TARKINGTON.

With decorations by E. C. Hooper and illustrations in two colors by C. D. Williams. Sixth Edition, $1.25.

Since the beginning of the present book buying season the sale of "Monsieur Beaucaire" has steadily increased. So great has been the demand that the publishers have gotten out three large editions within the past few weeks and another edition of 10,000 is now in the press. The cause of the popularity of Beaucaire is not hard to discover. The Boston Herald calls it "one of the prettiest and best books of the year." Book News says "its outward and visible form is uncommonly harmonious with its inward grace." The Sunday School Times says "The grace and beauty of it will linger many a day." Other words by other good authorities.

MAGAZINE WORK.

Literary Aspirants versus Celebrities.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In one of those "Talks at the Mermaid"—which were never reported—'tis said that Ben Jonson asked Shakespeare if, as he said, "all the world's a stage" and "all the men and women players merely," who, then, were the spectators? Shakespeare had his quip ready and answered in an impromptu epigram, the gist of which was that they were "both actors and spectators," too. Something of the same sort must be admitted to-day concerning readers and writers for the papers and magazines. It is not men (and boys) only, but women and girls, and babies even, who are born with a fountain pen instead of a gold spoon in the mouth. So naturally they take to the writing trade and thence to "editing" something or other till they are soon able to talk as learnedly and loftily of the canons of taste in authorship and literature as the best of them. And yet I would, by a canon as rigidly righteous, a law of writing as strict and severe, a command as peremptory, and a menacing "Thou shalt not" as forbiddingly stern as that which excludes all but "celebrities" from the magazine, prohibit all "babes," whether learned or not, from instructing us graybeards in the business of the world, its art and its literature. I think it a shame and a scandal that such things should be permitted. And I would go as far as any one, even forbidding young girls to learn their letters till the age of discretion, if that would put a stop to the cacoethes scribendi, the writing itch, and its most unhappy consequences. But our female children are not alone to blame in the matter. We have educated ourselves into the habit of thinking that as all are free and equal in this land of liberty so all are equally qualified to instruct others, whether they know anything or not. For, since all read, why should they not all write? If writing and publication suppose readers and subscribers, too, the writers must also be readers and educate themselves for writing as they go along. And as every trade has its own secrets, it must have been with a joyful anticipation that readers who are writers also by trade hailed the article on "Editing a Magazine" in the last issue of THE REVIEW. In these "Confessions of an Editor," although very few secrets of the sanctum are revealed, one fact of rather momentous importance is brought out. It is a fact which most readers have long suspected and believed, but which has never before been so openly avowed.

It is now for the first time proclaimed from the housetops that the determining factor of success in magazine writing and the grand criterion of all effort is, not the merit of the writing, but the authority or influence of the writer. In a word, celebrity! The only exception noted is that of story writing, because that requires "a certain sort of inspiration," which, unfortunately, is not confined to "celebrities." As for poetry, it is hardly worth mentioning. That is only used for "chinking up," where a quatrain or a quatorzain may serve to eke out the page at the tail end of a prose article. Yet, as our editor blithely remarks, the poets, in spite of these drawbacks, continue to "pipe on" for the very love of piping, and not because anybody cares to listen. The cheerful remark is ventured that probably "all the great poets are dead," and that appears to account for the lack of all interest in poetry, because if there were any demand for it the publisher and the magazine editor would surely know. Truly, as Coventry Patmore somewhere says, "Ill singing 'tis when there are none to hear." But I am inclined to think there never was a time when the great poets were not dead—to living publishers and magazine editors in their day. The greatness of great poets, at least of the greatest, is not known, and appears to be undiscoverable till they are dead and gone. And if Shakespeare was "so great as to be invisible to his contemporaries," we may infer the same to be measurably true of Homer, of Dante, and of Milton, the "blind old schoolmaster, who wrote a long and tedious poem called 'Paradise Lost.'"

So really it makes nothing against the great poets that they are not recognized by the "able editor" of their day. Probably the greatest poet America ever had—the greatest in promise if not in performance—died almost unknown and unrecognized the present year. His name was Richard Hovey. True, he was fast becoming a "celebrity," though he was not one strictly speaking when the fatal shears ended his life. He was merely one of a thousand "literary aspirants," whom, according to the firman, it is the especial business of the magazine editor to keep out. Knowing then what he was and what he had done—quite as much as Tennyson or Longfellow at his age—we can fairly measure the amount of "celebrity" required and attained by a man who had just won his entrée to the magazines. Nothing less can be accepted, and, presumably, nothing more would be required.

The fact, then, for the benefit of young writers and "literary aspirants" everywhere should be blazoned in every paper and magazine throughout the land: Take notice! Mark the criterion: "In the first place the chief duty of the successful magazine editor is to keep the literary aspirants out of his paper and to get celebrities in." In other words, you shan't go into the water till you have learned to swim.

No, that's hardly fair to THE SATURDAY REVIEW editor. He does allow, and even encourage, the "literary aspirant" to splash round in the newspaper swimming pool to his heart's content. But he says nothing of the mediocre verse, the long-winded stories, the heavy politico-economic essays, and the endless war material which, ad nauseam, all and sundry, are crammed down the throats of readers, for it is "Take this or nothing" from our "celebrities," who alone have the entrée and the monopoly of the magazines. That explains it all. We know now the origin of the "Sentimental Tommies" who inflict their tommyrot on the magazines. We know the Zangwills and the Zolas, the Cranes and the Corellis, the Poultney Bigelows and Harding Davises, the Richard Le Gallienes et id omne genus, and we are wearily and heartily sick of him altogether.

And Conan Doyle? "Steek your gab," man. Let us hear the last of these Boer wars, and of you, too, till you can write something worth reading, or do something worth writing. Discover the north pole or stand upon your head—you are not enough of a "celebrity," and I fear never will be, to bore us with your inanities.

But there's a chap in the Far East by the name of Lafcadio Hearn whom I would like to see and hear more of. And scattered over the world are many others, men of hidden and haunting genius, who are not "celebrities," but whose acquaintance I would be proud to make. And there are still some forgotten books and authors worth all the magazine trash ever printed, and yet almost as obscure as this writer, who is not even

A LITERARY ASPIRANT.

Every Author an Editor.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Every author is an editor. I make this assertion deliberately and after giving the theory herein set forth long and earnest thought. The editor of a magazine is the man who reads the numberless manuscripts thrust upon him and chooses a certain few as being available for his publication. The author is an editor, because he chooses from the numberless ideas, some the product of his own brain, some advanced by a friend, others by the witnessing of some, perhaps trivial, incident, and, perchance, others by overhearing this or that conversation, certain ones around which to weave a romance.

Does any author live who has written something upon every idea advanced in the numberless ways the idea has of attacking the brain? Certainly not! Does any editor live, or ever has lived, who has sent to his compositors every manuscript that came into his hands? Certainly not! For example: I have a friend who advances an idea upon which he wishes me to build a romance. He is certain that his idea is a perfect gem of thought; he is confident that a host of readers will be enraptured over any story that might be founded upon his idea. Perhaps they would; but for numerous reasons I do not think his idea available for my use. One reason may be that I have recently written a story upon just such an idea; so I tell him at once that his is not available; then, again, I might tell him that I would think it over and decide definitely at a later date. Another reason for the unavailability of the idea may be, to my way of thinking, that it is meritless. I might tell him so frankly—and offend him; so the chances are I would tell him that I would think it over.

Now, how do I, as the editor who chooses the material for stories to send to the magazines, compare with the editor who chooses the stories to send to his subscribers? The comparison is identical.

Let us fit the first of the reasons heretofore given for an idea's unavailability to an unavailable manuscript. I send a manuscript to the editor of a certain magazine; the chances are about nine out of ten that the idea embodied in my story has been the feature of some story already submitted to that particular editor; or, I will say that this editor has received nine manuscripts founded on my plot; eight of these he has returned to the writers, retaining but one—probably the first one. Now, what right have I to find fault with that editor for rejecting my manuscript any more than the man whose idea I rejected because I had already written a story upon the same thought has to be angry with me? Hasn't he as much right to say to me, "It would make a better story than lots you have written," as I would have to write to the editor, "It is a better story than lots you have printed in your magazine"? So much for reason for rejection number one; let us consider number two.

I send another manuscript to another editor, being thoroughly incensed against the first. This second story is really a good one, but the editor is unable to pass upon it immediately after reading. He puts it in his desk, thinking that if at any time he is short-run he will use it. Two months pass, and still I neither see my story in print nor hear a word from the editor about it. It happens that about this time another manuscript comes into his hands embodying the same principal idea that mine does. This last manuscript happens to be better in literary construction than mine. Of course it wouldn't do to print both, so mine comes back to me. Now, have I any more right to vigorously upbraid that editor for returning my story after holding, until I had arrived at the conclusion that it had been accepted, and then dashing my hopes by its return, than had the man reason to upbraid me for leading him to believe that I would build a romance upon his idea, and then disappoint him after he had indulged in the happy anticipation of the day when he would read in some magazine the story founded on an idea which was the production of his brain? Again, certainly not!

And now we come to the third reason why the idea advanced by my friend is unavailable for my use as a story writer,

THE DARLINGTONS

. . . . . By ELMORE ELLIOTT PEAKE . . . . . .

FROM its close relationship to the life and destiny of the people of every day affairs, The Darlingtons has a certain kind of interest that is generally lacking in fiction of to-day. It is typically American—only American conditions could have produced it—representing as it does the life of American industry and American enterprise. There is in it, too, the lightening touch of a well-defined love element. . .

"Mr. Peake has brought out a very characteristic American type which has never before had adequate treatment. . . . The Darlingtons might stand for thousands of flourishing families which represent the newer aristocracy of small towns in all parts of the country."—Springfield Republican.

"The history of a typical family of importance in a town, depicted with skill and accuracy."—Public Opinion.

"Clean, fresh, peaceful and thoroughly American. The characters are such people as we associate with every day. The story is full of life and action and unfailing in its interest, with a perfectly delightful American girl in the centre of it."—Pittsburg Index.

Fourth Edition, Cloth, 12mo, $1.50.

McCLURE, PHILLIPS & CO., Publishers

in comparison with my story being unavailable for the editor's use as an entertainer of the public. This third story, to my way of thinking, is simply immense; nothing so wonderful ever written. I feel certain that it will meet favor with the first editor who peruses it—in fact, if it does not, I will at once come to the conclusion that the editor does not know his business. But alas! The return mail sees the return of my manuscript. I look eagerly for some word of explanation for the return of my treasured budget of thought, but I find none. The truth of the matter is that the editor failed to unearth a single point of genuine merit in my entire five thousand words, and he, a very sympathetic man, lacked the necessary courage to tell me the plain truth. Would I have felt kindly toward him had he written but two words—"lacks merit"? And yet, what other words would have expressed the simple truth? But had he done this, my anger would have known no bounds, and had I known the editor to be other than the proprietor of the publication, I would doubtless have written the proprietor a letter demanding the immediate discharge of the offending editor.

Have I any more reason for penning that editor a letter censuring him for his unfathomable meaning; his disgraceful conduct in returning my manuscript, which I know to be a literary gem, in the manner he has done than the man who advances me an idea upon which I make no comment, has reason to censure me if I do not immediately commence the construction of a romance upon the idea that he considers a gem of thought, and yet in which I have failed to discover any merit? Not a bit. Would he thank me if I told him frankly that his idea possessed not the least particle of true merit? I hardly think he would.

Hence I repeat that every author is an editor, for as the editor must choose a certain few of the many manuscripts thrust upon him, just so must the author choose a certain few of the many ideas thrust upon his brain—some advanced by friends, but many more the product of his own ever watchful mind, upon which to build the romance that he hopes will please the editor.

So let the author-editor look upon his disappointments with a just amount of reason, and when he thinks he has cause to "growl," say to himself, "Am I not an editor to choose ideas as this man is an editor to choose stories? Must he not choose them as I choose ideas, choosing for the welfare of his magazine as I choose to further my success as a writer?"

I have submitted to editors manuscripts under all of the aforesaid conditions—and countless others—but an editor has yet to receive from me a letter censuring him for not performing his duties according to my wishes, for after my first hour of disappointment, I calmly reason to myself that I am an editor, and away goes my manuscript again, leaving behind it the hope that it may escape all the conditions it has encountered on former journeys.

Russia in Literature.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The writer of the article entitled "The Literature of Russia," published in your issue of Dec. 1, gives us a very misleading idea of the subject in hand. I have not read the book of Mr. Veliszewski, and cannot tell how correct the reviewer is in his estimate of it; but his remarks on the Russian language and literature are startling to anybody who is acquainted with either. Those who have taken the trouble to study Russian have found much beauty and wealth of expression in the language. Prosper Merimée, the French author, who was familiar with it, made the statement, more than a generation ago, that the mere fact of possessing so magnificent a language insured a glorious future to Russia. Neither the Russian language nor Russia itself can be said to be in a state of "asphyxia," as the reviewer expresses it.

The Russian language attained its full development and perfection in the early part of the nineteenth century, principally through the genius of two great poets—Pushkin and Lermontoff—who were contemporaries of Goethe and Schiller, and may be said to occupy their respective places in the literature of Russia. Pushkin died in 1837 and Lermontoff in 1841. On the 26th of May, 1899, the one hundredth anniversary of Pushkin's birth was observed in Russia, and throughout the whole length and breadth of the Russian Empire there was not a town or village that did not respond to the occasion by erecting schools and statues and founding scholarships and medals in his honor.

In St. Petersburg a new department was founded at the Academy of Sciences, with six professorships, devoted to the study of Russian literature and philology. In many of the provincial towns normal schools and scholarships were established bearing his name. In the Province of Thernigoff alone fifteen institutions of this kind were erected. As far as Siberia, in Tomsk and Irkutsk, Pushkin's memory was honored in this way. To enumerate all that was done in Russia to perpetuate the memory of her national poet would fill many pages. I do not think that any other nation has ever done so much to honor a gifted writer. Yet Pushkin's name is almost unknown here, although I am told that his works are translated into English.

The fact that some Russian writers were obliged to live abroad, and consequently became better known to Western Europe, does not prove that there were no other writers in Russia. Some of the best among them have never been abroad. Gogol, the inimitable humorist, "behind whose laughter the tears can be felt," was one of them. A score of names could be mentioned, all distinguished, all dear to the heart of a Russian, who fill the time between Pushkin and Tolstoi. That their works are not translated here is not their fault, nor is it their loss.

In conclusion let me quote the words of a Russian veteran in literature, journalist and author, A. S. Soovorin:

I am only a Russian writer. I have earned this title, and would not exchange it for any other. I love our literature because it is truly Russian; Christian in its spirit, full of charity and helpfulness toward our weaker brethren, shedding tears of loving sympathy over their unhappy lot. Ours is a grand and beautiful literature, which can proudly take a stand by the side of that of any other nation of Western Europe. There are still much poverty and suffering in Russia, but there is also in our land the strong spirit of national pride, of devotion to the ruler and to the country, and confidence in our own strength. * * * It is this spirit that has made the Russian Empire and placed it on solid foundations. The more freedom this spirit attains, the easier life will become, and the more fruitful will be our work.

As a Russian writer I have the firm faith that the empire will keep pace with Russian literature, in sharing its ideals, realizing them, or even forestalling them. Literature is the great congress of our land—whose vote cannot be corrupted.

Some Short Stories.*

Who "pinched" Mrs. De Vaux's diamond locket—and that little trinket worth $1,000? Mrs. De Vaux had a bad way of fainting in the street. To swoon in New York at the corner, say, of Twentieth Street and Broadway, is certainly a hazardous performance. People swarmed round the fainting lady, and when she revived, her watch, chain, and locket were gone. It looked bad for Miss Isabella Hall, who had just come from Mexico, for when she was searched, the chain was found in her pocket. The policeman gathered up Miss Hall and she was sent to the Tombs. If it had not been for Robert Purvis, the young lady might have been serving out a term of imprisonment to-day. Purvis went to some place of amusement, and even when there, seeing the show, his mind was full of the nice girl who was under arrest. Then he looked around him and saw a woman who bore the strongest resemblance to Miss Hall. His suspicions were at once aroused. He had a talk with a detective. It was a case of mistaken identity. The girl from Mexico was innocent, and the true culprit owned up, for the diamond locket was found in the possession of the girl who had frequented the variety show. Another story is about an actress who is tired of the shilly-shallying of her suitor, Mr. Stillmane. Dora proposes that their marriage should take place at once. Stillmane becomes quite convinced that the knot had better be tied, and so, post-haste, the nuptial ceremony takes place. In the volume there are some nine short stories.

"EXCLUSIVE" LITERATURE.

It is a pretty sound theory of literature that almost everything written and printed is designed to be read, and that no writer of fiction and belles lettres feels the worse for having a large instead of a small number of readers. The "exclusive" fellows in literature may be very fine fellows and rarely gifted, but they are not often exclusive from choice. It may be human for them to attribute the poor circulation of their writings to their superior taste and to pretend to think they do not care for popular approval. But every artist, though he may devote his life to art pure and simple, is happier if fame comes to him while he lives and with it brings fortune. Good books are not written to be neglected.

The writer of a communication in The Evening Post the other day declared his opinion to the contrary, however. His text was that every true artist abhors the popular "style." If that term is to be applied to certain flamboyant and grotesque writers who have lately managed to occupy somewhat too large a share of the public attention, it is a good enough text. But after all, the success of these works of fiction that a few sensitive artists think so puerile is really a sign of an improved public taste. They are much better books, and much nearer the standard of good literature, than the works of fiction most of their voracious readers used to devour. They are stepping stones in the cultivation of many an intellect from lower and coarser to higher and finer things.

But did not Scott, Thackeray, Dickens, have the "popular style"? Their books were eagerly read and widely circulated in their lifetime. Does any true artist disparage their merit or abhor their popularity?

"Walter Pater," says this "exclusive" critic, "could undoubtedly have surpassed 'Ben Hur' or 'Quo Vadis,' but he preferred to write 'Marius' without the slightest hope of its being popular." Pater, whose style was far from being pure, and whose fame is not likely to live very long, could have written "Ben Hur" just about as easily as Gen. Lew Wallace could write "Appreciations."

THE COLLEGE DINNER.

This is the season of college dinners, the season that might have been celebrated by Swinburne in his melodious line as to the "day that loses, the night that wins."

The primary professed purpose of the college dinner is the joyous reunion of men in various stages of elderliness to renew the memories of student days, sing with changed voices the student songs, the literary and musical defects of which are compensated by the resurgent zest of the singers, and generally to have as good a time as prudence and family obligations will allow. It is a perfectly reasonable and wholesome purpose, and in this big town, where even the smaller colleges can usually muster a goodly number of alumni, it is carried out with a good deal of energy and success.

The primary and avowed purpose of the college dinner, however, is not the sole one or even the chief one. One real aim of the devoted sons of the college, in most cases, is to get together and give the President and the professors a chance to report the fortunes of the college, to explain their plans, to define their principles and theories and appeal to an interested body of hearers in behalf of the work in their charge. It is in the dining hall under the influence of the social and other stimulus that the pursestrings are loosened by reflex action from the warmed cockles of the heart. Nor is this device to be in any degree contemned. It is a curious fact in the strenuous commercial and financial struggle of American life that American education of the higher order is supported in the main by voluntary contributions, and on the whole richly supported. We might well imagine that the worship of the dollar, so freely attributed to Americans in lands where the colleges are mostly maintained out of the taxes, would keep us from such generous giving. But there are two facts that tend against this conclusion. One is that Americans who have never had the advantage of college education are shrewd enough to realize their lack, and ready to give in order that the young men succeeding them shall not suffer in the same way. The second is that American college men are pretty good at making money themselves, and in giving to colleges are simply providing for the spread and perpetuation of something that they know how to prize.

It is of course to the latter class that the college dinner especially addresses itself. But this class are not mere givers. They are veritable guides and philosophers as well as friends. They take part, through their alumni associations, not merely in the support of their colleges, but in shaping their policy and fixing their aims. It is this that has given such vitality to the American college and has sustained it in such numbers and variety. It is easy to criticise the standard of some of them and to point out the disadvantages of the confusion that exists among them. But it must be remembered that they are the spontaneous product and gradual evolution of a system of absolute freedom. If we find among them the defects due to their origin we find also that they serve varied needs on account of that origin, and the service far more than offsets the defects. The alumni associations are the outcome of that universal and efficient instinct of co-operation that has done so much for the United States in every field of activity. The college dinner is in a way the annual meeting of the shareholders in the noble and unselfish enterprises in which they are engaged. It is none the less effective for being, as a rule, extremely jolly.

A LIBRARY SIX MILES FROM A TOWN.

The most remarkable feature of the Weis Library is its location. It stands at the junction of two country roads known as the Valley and the Thomas Road, in Millcreek Township, Erie County, Penn., about six miles from the City of Erie.

Its immediate surroundings are a well-kept grass plot, dotted here and there with flower beds, and neat gravel walks, bordered on each side by roses and hardy hydrangeas. Beyond these are acres of fields and pasture land, with a background—viewing from the front of the building—of woods, along which runs a shady lane to a near-by farmhouse.

Sixty acres of this beautiful country belong to the library, generously given in his will, together with the money necessary to build and furnish the building, by John Weis, a prosperous farmer, who lived the greater part of his life on the farm upon which the library now stands, and died there in 1892. In addition to the gifts already mentioned, John Weis made provision for the maintenance of the library by giving several houses to be rented and used by the Trustees for that purpose.

The kind and generous forethought of this man was productive of other provisions of much importance to the visitors of Weis Library. Though the exterior of the building is not elaborate, being a square brick structure, plain but neat, the interior arrangements bear evidence of having been devised by a person thoroughly acquainted with the practical working of such a library as the building was intended to accommodate.

A portion of the hall is occupied by the Weis Library Post Office, that being a most convenient place for the families in that portion of the country to get their mail. The reading room, entered directly from the hall, is furnished with three long tables, upon which can be found all the late magazines and periodicals, together with several farm papers, which are doubtless of much interest, as well as instructive to the patrons of the library. On the walls of the reading room are several racks, well filled with all the Erie, Buffalo, and other daily papers.

Adjoining the reading room is the book department, containing about 2,000 volumes of history, fiction, and reference books, all of which are free to be taken from the library by any responsible persons. The book department contains also the private library of John Weis, which is composed of not more than fifty volumes, some of which are over one hundred years old.

The third floor of the building is fitted up as a public hall, where people in the neighborhood or sleighing parties are at liberty to enjoy themselves, so long as they comply with the rules of the Trustees. The basement is furnished as a dining room for picnic parties. It is supplied with tables, benches, cupboards well filled with all necessary dishes, a stove, and fuel.

Everything is kept in order by the custodian, who also acts as librarian. He lives with his family on the second floor of the building, and has two rooms in the basement.

Every department of the Weis Library is free to the public on every day but Sundays and holidays, the only requirements being a strict adherence to the rules of the Trustees, which call for perfect quiet in the reading room, a fine for the abuse of books taken from the building, no liquor, dancing, or games of chance to be indulged in by parties enjoying the use of the public hall or grounds, and the giving of at least forty-eight hours' notice by parties larger than ten in number wishing to use the basement. Everything in the management is done very systematically, according to the wishes of John Weis, who owed a great part of his success in life to his ruling characteristic—that of doing things systematically and with great care. Had he been a man of less prudence, economy, and perseverence, there would be no Weis Library, and the people in that neighborhood would have no such opportunity of gaining a knowledge of good literature.

Who can tell what benefits may some day be derived in other farming neighborhoods from the example and generosity of this man? His deed is worthy of attention even from those who will never visit the building that stands in the fields six miles from Erie as a monument to his memory and a potent inspiration to the world at large.

HALF AN HOUR WITH CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.

It was soon after the publication of "A Little Journey in the World" that I met Charles Dudley Warner at a field night of the University Club in Baltimore.

He was there as the guest of Richard Malcolm Johnston, through whose friendship I was granted more than the courteous moment to which time and numbers limited Mr. Warner's acknowledgment of compliment and introduction that evening. For everybody was talking about his book, and everybody wanted to meet him. He stood under the arch leading into the library, his thin, dark face, aquiline features, rather long hair, and dreamy gray eyes a picturesque contrast to Col. Johnston's square, rusty-red face, snow-white, close-cropped head, and bright, blue eyes—the gentle reticence of his manner subdued almost into impassiveness by the other's soldier-like warmth and unconventionality. I thought him looking very tired, and afterward he told me that this reception was the fag end of a breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, each one longer and more ceremonious than the other, and that the only drawback to the pleasure of a visit to Baltimore was the fabulous capacity for food demanded of a man.

Two impressions are most vivid in my memory of him—the unfailing courtesy with which he responded to every platitude and bore the most irrelevant interruptions, and the patience with which he listened to my crude criticisms of his book. "A Little Journey in the World" was one of the first novels to take up the Wall Street speculator and the New York leader of fashion, and at the time of Mr. Warner's visit to Baltimore we were busy fitting Henderson and Margaret to various prominent men and women in New York. Margaret herself had been an object lesson to me—as she was, doubtless, to other women absorbed in the idly busy life of a large and gay society—and I welcomed the opportunity to probe the genesis of her creation and question some of the lines of her development. I tried to tell Mr. Warner something of what the book had meant to me, and the freedom from vanity and self-consciousness with which he listened and answered made my talk with him one of the most delightful half hours of my life.

Among other things, I asked him if it was true that the youngest Astor bride was the original of Margaret. "No," he answered; "I wish I could point to one original. Margaret is simply the embodiment of what I see around me every day—the promise of a noble and beautiful womanhood withering in the grasp of our great National evil."

"Wealth? Society?" I asked, a little puzzled. "Making haste to be rich and being rich in haste."

I suggested that it was not only in America that men speculated. He smiled. "As a Nation we are the greatest speculators in the world, and our women share the profits of our speculations as the women of no other country do. Margaret is an American woman—possible only in and to America." Then, with a sudden smile lighting his eye, "I must tell you the greatest compliment I ever had paid any of my work. Just after the Harper appeared in which Henderson's railroad swindle and Margaret's outburst of righteous indignation are chronicled, I had a letter from a woman in Brooklyn, a good Baptist, begging me to bring Margaret to their weekly prayer meeting, because, 'She's not too far gone yet to be converted.'"

"But why did you let her die?" I exclaimed. "I can't forgive you that!" His eyes softened and darkened. "Because I was so pitiful of her," he said; "because I could not let her reach her legitimate end."

I said I agreed with his Baptist friend that Margaret was too good not to be better. He shook his head. "Graft a New England conscience upon a sensuous temperament with occasion and opportunity to stifle the one and indulge the other, marry them to a Henderson, and the result is almost a foregone conclusion."

"But she might have saved Henderson."

"In a book—not in New York. You forget she was in love with him."

"THE WIT OF OTHER MEN."

In the interesting paper on "Misquotation," in THE REVIEW for Nov. 17, the author refers to Wordsworth's exquisite lines:

Will no one tell me what she sings?
Perchance the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things,
And battles long ago.

In this article they are spoken of as belonging to Wordsworth's "Solitary Reaper," and authenticating the fact from memory, I thought so, too. But I was a little surprised to find in a paper on "Expression in Poetry," in The National Review for September, the same stanza quoted by the author of the article—the Rev. H. C. Beeching—as from the "Highland Girl," which is, "What shall I say? Strange, upon my honor!" Both the writer in THE REVIEW and the one in The National Review make their statements of the source of the quotation with calm authority. In THE REVIEW the writer on "Misquotation" puts special stress upon the lines, for they have been, to his sorrow, misquoted. Mr. Beeching follows his quotation, which he uses happily as an illustration of "genuine poetry," with the following paragraph:

If we take these lines to pieces, we may be tempted to say it is the prosiest verse ever written; "old," "unhappy," "far-off," are words of an everyday vocabulary, and "Will no one tell me what she sings" might occur in almost any drawing room conversation. But if we are content not to take the passage to pieces, if we are content to receive it and let it make its own impression as a whole, we must acknowledge it to be a perfect rendering of the effect on the poet's mind of the wild, vague, sad Highland music. A good proof of poetical adequacy is that such lines cannot be paraphrased.

Confusion in the placing of this quotation seems sadly confounded. I have no copy of Wordsworth to refer to at the present moment, so I am in a state of indecision as to which authority is correct. The odds in my mind are fairly in favor of "The Solitary Reaper." It seems strange that such contradictions should occur—and of such well-known lines. But are they well known? It is much as a familiar face in a crowd, whose name has slipped the memory. The quotation is, so to say, not shopworn. The delicacy of the sentiment has the faint uncatchable sweetness that wakens response and charm. Is it possible one doesn't know to which poem this exquisite word picture belongs? Fancy not knowing which of Shakespeare's heroes said, "To be or not to be"? or "I dare do all that may become a man," or where "Ring out, wild bells," "Pleasures are like poppies spread," &c., are to be found! They are well quoted, well known, and obvious. But the things that are less handled by the idle crowd, that are rather the finer meanings which the "few discern, and a very few feel burn," are of importance enough, for those who appreciate to inform themselves concerning.

I fancy there are few of us who have not striven to recover from inner consciousness the "fugacious" word that eludes capture to complete some dimly remembered quotation—the word that is necessary, but that dances just beyond the grasp and vexes with its erratic gleam the futile pursuit. We try to persuade ourselves we have made the correct choice, but we know we haven't.

Misquotation is a serious thing. To glean vagrantly from the fields of literature without sufficient interest to be accurate and authentic in one's transcription of the borrowed passage is indolence—perhaps worse.

"To know is something," and to know thoroughly is something more. Careless quotation mars the charm which the perfect fusion of words and sentiment gives and which requires exact rendering.

There are those who misquote through indolence as well as ignorance, and quotations are often attributed to the wrong sources. The persistent effort to cast Sterne's "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" upon the charity of the Bible is to be remembered. The rose does not smell as sweet by any other name, and a quotation should not be used unless it is rendered impeccably from the text of the author.

If one would quote and evidence familiarity with "Shakespeare and the musical glasses," let him by all hazards be sure of his authority, and able to appreciate sympathetically the bearing of the apposite word upon the meaning and the melody of the text. The trouble is comparatively little—indeed, verifying a quotation is a pleasure to a certain contingent of book lovers, and the correct placing from memory of the quotable fragments of literature is an enviable one.

"Quick thy tablets memory."

It has been said that "the happy application of a verse from Virgil was worth a talent." If one would make memory, indeed, a paradise from which, as Richter says, one may not be driven, one should be very careful in the search for possible error when one quotes from, let me say, "Plautus and the rarer poets."

MAY HARRIS.

THE WEEK IN ART.

Christmastide is not usually marked by much activity in the New York art world in the way of public or private exhibitions. The dealers are too much occupied in supplying the needs of the purchasers of Christmas gifts, and the public is too busy preparing for the festival and the succeeding holidays to have time to devote to art displays. With the remarkable business prosperity of this year, however, there are more little exhibitions, club displays, &c., than have ever been held at this time of the year.

***

The Union League Club is holding its second monthly art display. The Lotos Club has just concluded its initial display for the season. The Black and White Club's third annual exhibition at the Duran-Ruel galleries closes this evening. Joseph Lindon Smith of Boston is showing a number of original pictures and copies of Egyptian, Italian, and Grecian architectural masterpieces at the Architectural League rooms. There are some canvases by Arthur B. Davies at the Macbeth Gallery, Ben Foster's interesting and forceful landscapes are at the Crist-Delmonico, Augustus Fraenzen's strong portraits at the Oehme, Paul da Longpré's California flower water colors at the Knoedler, Walter L. Palmer's Winter landscapes at the Avery, and some old masters at the Durand-Ruel gallery.

***

In addition to these numerous, varied, and interesting club exhibitions and "one-man" displays, the dealers' galleries are more than usually well stocked with old and modern foreign canvases and American pictures of note. T. B. Blakeslee has some remarkably good examples of the early English, Flemish, and Dutch schools. There are some good Barbizon canvases at Oehme's, Schaus's, Knoedler's, and Avery's; a rarely good lot of Monets and others of the French impressionists at Durand-Ruel's, while the lovers of American landscapes will find examples of the best home painters, as well as of the best foreign artists, at Clausen's and Kraushaar's. At Tooth's, modern English art is best represented, and the new Dowdeswell gallery has some unusual examples of the Hallau primitives and other old masters.

***

It is not easy to understand why the Art Committee of the Lotos Club should have made a joint exhibition of Alexander Blumenstell's fan blades, painted by over threescore noted modern foreign and American artists, and a well-selected collection of the landscapes of R. A. Blakelock, one of the most original, poetical, and strongest of American painters. The two exhibits jarred. The fan blades are essentially decorative and slight in themselves. The Blakelock landscapes are large in conception, thoughtful and beautiful in tone and color. The guests of the club members, who thronged to the exhibition, and especially its feminine part, raved over the fan blades, and the exquisite tonal dreams of poor Blakelock were comparatively neglected.

***

The Blumenstell fan blades should have been shown by themselves or in conjunction with a display of modern decorative works. Mr. Blumenstell has given years to the formation of his collection, and it is a unique as well as valuable one. Each blade has been painted by a modern foreign or American artist of ability and reputation, of some characteristic subject. Vibert, of course, for example, contributes a Cardinal; Casanova, a monk; Beraud, a Paris street scene, and Clays, a Dutch marine. The ivory lends itself well to some of the brushes, and not so well to others, but the collection, as a whole, is a delightful and instructive one.

***

It is too late a day to discuss the work of R. A. Blakelock, or to agitate the question of his place among American landscapists. There are those who place him in the rank with the great trio of Inness, Wyant, and Homer Martin. There are those who consider him inferior to these landscapists, and merely an eccentric colorist. There can be little dissent, however, from the general proposition that he possesses both originality and force, and that is perhaps the best estimate which accords him a place by and for himself as a painter who, while his range is not so wide as that of Inness, Wyant, or Martin, his brush less responsive than theirs, and his treatment a little monotonous, still with them has something of their insight into nature's varied moods and much of their poetic sympathy and feeling. Most of the Blakelock landscapes at the Lotos Club display came from the collections of Catherine Lambert, George A. Hearn, and William Macbeth, and, with few exceptions, have been seen at this or that gallery or exhibition. They need no description now. Perhaps the best and strongest were the "Moonlight Night," the "Indian Encampment," "Moonrise at Sunset," and "Silvery Moonlight." These, with their fellows, are rarely fine tone and color dreams, filled with that imagination which in Turner so inspired Ruskin, and are all the work of a man who has the true artistic soul.

An exhibition of paintings by Joseph Lindon Smith at the gallery of the Architectural League in Fifty-seventh Street began on Dec. 7, and will continue until Dec. 24. It is the first exhibition of Mr. Smith's work in New York, but has been shown in Boston, where the painter resides; at the St. Botolph Club, and at the Museum of Fine Arts. The work has been appreciated to such an extent by the artist's friends and acquaintances that he has had very little of it at any time in his possession, and the paintings shown are, with a few exceptions, loaned. As painting Mr. Smith's work has been well said to belong to the mode of representation. In this respect it is that to which art lovers are accustomed. The old masters painted thoughts, not sights. They give ideas, not impressions. In so doing they stand above modern artists. No one appreciates this difference more fully than Mr. Smith himself, for he is not merely a painter, but a student and lover of the great art of the past, which is the subject matter of almost all of his work. Spending much of his time in Italy, in Greece, and in Egypt, he has chosen to paint from the masterpieces of architectural design and of sculpture instead of painting the people or the landscape, life, or nature. It rarely happens that a painter of ability chooses to paint from works of art instead of from nature. Most painters prefer to do what they call "original work." When it comes to the painting of sights to the definition of visual impressions it makes very little difference whether the subject be the Ilaria of Jacopo della Quescia or Mrs. B., who wants her likeness done. It is just as much of an achievement to paint well the Colossi of Aboo Simbel as to paint the natural rock from which they have been cut, or the sands of the Lybian Desert under which they have been buried. As painting Mr. Smith's work is good. He has a good sense of form, of light, and color. The "Barga Pulpit," the doorway of St. Mark's in Venice, with the columns of black marble; the Ilaria already referred to, the "Nike" from the Acropolis at Athens, the studies of Aboo Simbel, outside and inside, are all good and faithful reproductions. His most recent and in every way most difficult piece of work is the sculptures of the so-called Alexander sarcophagus, in Constantinople, in recognition of which work the painter was decorated by the Sultan. These are all good paintings as well as accurate illustrations.

As illustrations they have a special educational value. In appreciation of this the Trustees of the Boston Museum have recently purchased the representation of the Alexander sarcophagus.

Mr. Buell Has a Word with John Morley.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The gratuitous fling at the memory of Paul Jones which Mr. John Morley found inclination to embody in a line of his "Cromwell," though perhaps annoying, will hardly seem formidable to those acquainted with the character and mental habits of Mr. Morley himself. The late Artemus Ward used to say that "if a fellow can't attract public attention by any other means, he can always fall back on committing a nuisance!"

A keen sense of this happy alternative has been exhibited with more or less obtrusiveness from time to time throughout Mr. Morley's career. In his own country he is the prophet, par excellence, of that creed of querulous politics whose average devotee Disraeli once described as "the enemy of every man but himself and the friend of every country but his own." However, neither in that nor in any other respect does he differ from the professional "reformer," either in England or in this country. One of Dr. Sam Johnson's definitions was:

"Patriotism: I. Love of country; 2. The last refuge of a scoundrel." In our time some humorous lexicographer might define: "Reform. The last resort of a political outcast," viewing the word, of course, in its secondary sense as applied to the "professional" type.

The professional "reformer," as typified in John Morley, is by no means a complex organism. On the contrary, it is among the simplest—and, by the same token, the cheapest. The necessary elements are merely a fair command of language, money enough to provide literary leisure, and the temperament of a common scold. These given, the rest follows. In Mr. Morley's case the mischief has been somewhat aggravated by frequent spasms of sentimental statesmanship and petticoat politics in England during his lifetime, and these have from time to time enabled him to append himself to the coat-tails of Gladstone in a relation not unlike that between Agamemnon and Thersites.

The present healthy and virile trend of English politics, however, so completely exercises Mr. Morley from current attention or importance that he is driven away back into history to find a scolding ground. I think the two columns you gave up to him last Saturday were more than he is entitled to—on this side of the water at least. He may, however, still be worth a stickful.

AUGUSTUS C. BUELL.

Portraits of Christ—A Letter from Gen. Hawkins.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 8 there is a correspondent's answer to a request for information about the personal appearance of Jesus. It is without qualification a long ago discredited account, which was never seriously considered. Until I read this communication I had believed that this description of Christ, attributed to "Publius Lentulus, President of Judea, in the reign of Tiberius Caesar," had been discarded as being unworthy of belief, and was somewhat astonished to see it set forth as a fact.

In the Dictionary of Christian Biography, by Smith and Wace, may be found the following brief mention of the Lentulus statement: "The reputed author of an apocryphal letter to the Roman Senate about Christ. It gives mediaeval ideas about Christ's personal appearance." This is a careful condensation of a now generally accepted belief.

It is not known that there was ever such an official in Jerusalem as President, or that a man named Lentulus ever occupied an analogous position. We do know, however, that during the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate was Governor. Up to this time there has been made no discovery of any drawing, painted portrait, bas-relief, statue, bust, stamp on coin, or written description of Christ of which there is any truth whatever of its having been done during His life or after His death by any one who saw Him while He was alive.

Several supposed counterfeit presentments have, from time to time, been brought to the notice of scholars, but which, upon examination, proved to have had no connection with the personal appearance of the Saviour.

RUSH C. HAWKINS.

New York, Dec. 11, 1900.

A Letter from M. D. Conway.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

The Lentulus letter is one of the most successful "fakes" in the history of religious fraud, because of its beauty. Rossetti's "Head of Christ," which has long been my cherished possession, was, I believe, painted under the inspiration of this pretty invention, and if the appearance of Jesus had not been too rigidly conventionalized when it was devised, (fifteenth century,) no doubt the pretended letter would have marked its reappearances during its five centuries in other beautiful works. Had it only been as artful as it is artistic it would be the masterpiece of fabrications and Christian historians might to-day be defending instead of repudiating its pretensions. The old inventor imprudently put Lentulus in a city where no such person ever was, gave him an office that never existed, and made him write about Christus Jesus, an appellation unknown during the lifetime of Jesus and evidently taken from the New Testament. The adventures of the hoax have been tracked by Gabler, Herzog, Dr. Robinson, Schaff, and others, and there is a good summary in McClintock & Strong's "Cyclopaedia." The original is given in this cyclopedia, and those familiar with Latin will find it amusing and instructive to compare the old letter with what it has become at the close of the nineteenth century, as quoted in your issue of Dec. 8. The "Son of God" (vocant filium Dei) in the first sentence has become "offspring of the immortal God, (more Romanilke,) the "red beard" has been suppressed, the "changing and brilliant eyes" are now blue, and a considerable number of adjectives have been added. It is to be hoped that your correspondents —Miss Florence Lindsay and Mr. Spencer Robertson—will let us know the source of their translation, for it is worthy of comparative study as indicating the causa causans of the fiction.

Nothing is more certain to scholars occupied with Christian history, whatever their creeds, than the fact that not one scrap or sentence written during the lifetime of Jesus, by Jew or Gentile, contains any allusion to Him whatever, or even to His existence; also, that of all the writings about Him after His death not one has been traced to a contemporary.

MONCURE D. CONWAY.

New York, Dec. 12, 1900.

Not Older Than the Fourth Century.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

Your correspondent, H. M. Miller, on Page 822 of your issue of Nov. 24, is perfectly correct in his impression that no description of the physical characteristics of Christ have come down to us from His time. None of the evangelists gives us the least hint with respect to the personal appearance of Christ.

The one you print on Page 890 is found in a Latin letter, which pretends to have been written by Publius Lentulus, a contemporary of Pilate and President of the people of Judea, (no such office existed,) and sent to the Roman Senate. This letter was first discovered in a manuscript copy of the works of Anselm, in the twelfth century, and is certainly not older than the fourth century. Another description is found in the works of John of Damascus, in the eighth century, and a third in the church history of Nicephorus, fourteenth century. Besides these traditions may be mentioned the two so-called pictures of Christ—that sent by Him to King Abgarus and that imprinted on the handkerchief of Veronica. According to the legend, St. Veronica was a pious woman of Jerusalem, who when Christ passed by her on His way to Golgotha, took off her head covering and handed it to Him in order that He might wipe the blood and sweat from His face, and when He returned the cloth His features had become impressed upon it. Isn't this the first account of instantaneous photography on record?

C. S. CAMPBELL.

Owego, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1900.

Many inquiries have been made as to whether Deacon Bradbury, in Mr. Edwin Asa Dix's novel of that name, is a real character and was drawn from any one whom the author personally knew. Several attempts have also been made to locate Felton, the Vermont village where the events described in the book took place. Mr. Dix, however, states that the Deacon is not drawn from any actual personage whatever, and that, to the best of his knowledge, there is no village of Felton, under that or any other name, in New England. Intending pilgrims may therefore spare their journey.

A PROPHECY.

To-day we publish "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," in association with Mr. John Murray of London, who vouches for their authenticity. We venture to say that during the coming weeks these exquisite letters form the book which will be most read and discussed. In London their extraordinary quality has already been recognized, and columns are being published in the newspapers about their probable authorship. The N. Y. Evening Post in a notice from advance sheets says:

"The letters are so exquisite that one hesitates to detach any individual beauty from its setting. (Then after quotations): With these extracts, which suffer in being torn from the context, the reader is left to judge the ratio of literature to life in this exquisite book."

Also ready to-day is the first part of "The Furniture of Our Forefathers," one of the most handsome and interesting works we have ever published. This initial Part (there will be 8) covers the furniture in use at the South before 1700 and is handsomely bound in stiff blue paper with buff stamping; the many beautiful illustrations of 17th Century furniture are reproduced in photogravure, halftone and line drawings; and a subscription to the series of parts could hardly be improved on as a Christmas present.

Adapted for the Use of Schools and for Self-Instruction. By JAMES E. MUNSON, Official Stenographer, New York Supreme Court, author of "The Art of Phonography," etc.

What THE HARTFORD POST says of Mr. Munson's previous book: To those who are looking for the best system of instruction in this most important art, the "Art of Phonography" is cordially recommended. It has stood the test of thirty years. It is practical. The book is a complete guide, compendium, and reference work.

Method of Evolution.

By H. W. Conn, Ph.D., Instructor of Biology in the Wesleyan University. 8vo, $2.00.

Prof. Conn, who in a previous work summarized for the popular reader the evidence for and against the general theory of organic evolution, has now brought the subject up to date by reviewing the present attitude of science toward the various evolutionary theories. The work gives an especially full account of the theories of heredity inaugurated by Weismann, and of the very great change that they have produced in the view which biologists take to-day in regard to all phenomena connected with evolution and development.

A Book of Common Worship

A Book of Common Worship is the outgrowth of a belief, on the part of the State Conference, in the possibilities of common worship. It is published with the hope not only that it may be found useful in the sessions of the Conference, but also that other State Conferences and similar gatherings may make use of it; that independent religious societies may perhaps find it helpful in the development of their worship; and that it may prove a spiritual aid and comfort to many individuals in their own private use.

The Moving Finger Writes

By GRACE DENIO LITCHFIELD, author of "In the Crucible." $1.25.

"In delineation of character, Miss Litchfield shows a master hand. She breathes life into the creations of her pen, and they stand out, boldly defined from the background of the story. 'The Moving Finger Writes' is psychological in its nature, yet the action does not suffer on that account, and mystery, tragedy, and love do not let interest lag for a moment. The book is one that will appeal chiefly to young women, whose dreams are not yet correlated with the facts of the actual world around them."—The Christian Register.

MAJOR ANDRE.

William L. Stone Writes in His Behalf.

To The New York Times Saturday Review:

In a recent "History of Westchester County" there is reference to Major André, in which the author, as if André were a living person instead of a cool, dispassionate review, attacks his character with such apparent personal venom that I beg of you space in which to refute some of his allegations.

There are many instances given in this work (as a general thing accurate) regarding André wholly untrue, all of which space prevents me from contradicting, but among them the author states that André was a sneak; that his three captors were "simple and honest country boys," that the gold watch taken by them from their captive Washington allowed them to retain as spoils of war; that André was totally devoid of honor, and that therefore his statements to Major Tallmadge were utterly false; and, finally, that André was of a very superficial and volatile character. The author also alludes in a very unbecoming manner to the fact of André's cherishing, as a most precious memento, a miniature of Honora Sneyd, by whom before his departure from England he had been rejected. But, as this latter charge has no relevance to the matter we are now considering, I shall not allude to it further.

First, then, if André was a "sneak," what would Nathan Hale, who on the gallows regretted that he had "only one life to give for his country," be called? The principles for which they both suffered were precisely the same. Spies have to be employed by each opposing army, and if persons voluntarily enlist for this dangerous service, and thus take their fate into their own hands, I really do not see how they are to be called "sneaks," besides other appellations of like character. Of course, we are all very glad that André did not succeed in accomplishing his object, (as the British were that Nathan Hale did not,) and the action, a few years since, of Dean Stanley, when in this country, under the glamour of his host, Cyrus Field, in erecting a monument to André at Tappan, may not have been in the best of taste. Still, from André's standpoint, I can easily see that a high ideal of duty urged him on in the same way which actuated Nathan Hale. Therefore, I ask, where, in the abstract, is the difference in the conduct of these two?

Again, referring to the statements made by André regarding the actions of his three captors, Pauiding, Van Wart, and Williams, I will quote from a letter of Gen. King, written from Ridgefield, Conn., June 17, 1817, to a friend of my father. Gen. King prefaces his letter by stating that "I was the first and only officer who had charge of André while at the headquarters of the Second Regiment of Light Dragoons, which was then at Esquire Gilbert's at South Salem. He was brought up by an Adjutant and four men belonging to the Connecticut militia under the command of Lieut. Col. Jameson from the lines near Tarrytown, a character under the disguised name of John Anderson. He looked somewhat like a reduced gentleman. * * * While we were walking together he said he must make a confidant of somebody, and knew not a more proper person than myself. * * * After passing Crumpound, and thinking himself past all danger, he was assailed by three countrymen near Tarrytown, who ordered him to stand. He said to them: 'I hope, gentlemen, you belong to the lower party.' 'We do,' says one. 'So do I. * * * I am a British officer on business of importance, and must not be detained.' Thereupon one of them took his watch from him and ordered him to dismount. The moment that was done he said he found he was mistaken and must shift his tone. He then said to them, 'I am happy to find I am mistaken. You belong to the upper party, and so do I, and, to convince you of it, here is Gen. Arnold's pass,' handing it to them. 'Damn Arnold's pass,' said they. (Lovely and honest and unsophisticated peasants, were they not?) 'You said you were a British officer. Where is your money?' 'Gentlemen, I have none about me,' he replied. 'You a British officer, pooh! A gold watch and no money! Let us search him.' They then examined his saddle, but found none. Says one, 'He has his money in his boots. Let's have them off and see.' In his boots they found papers, but no money. He said he saw they had such a thirst for money he would put them in a way to get it. They answered, 'If we deliver you at King's Bridge we shall be sent to the Sugar House and you will save your money.' He says, 'If you will not trust my honor two of you may stay with me and one shall go with the letter I will write. Name your sum.' The sum was agreed upon, but I cannot recollect whether it was 500 or 1,000 guineas, but I think the latter was the sum. They then held a consultation for a considerable time, and finally decided that if he wrote a party would be sent out to take them, and then they would all be prisoners. Thereupon they took him to the commanding officer on the lines, but retained his watch until Gen. Washington sent for them to Tappan, and made them restore the watch to Major André.

"Thus you see, had money been at command after the imprudent confession of Major André, or any security given that the British would have put confidence in, he might have passed on to Sir Henry Clinton's headquarters with all his papers and Arnold's pass into the bargain."

Now, the fact that André related all these circumstances regarding his capture in so much detail to Gen. King only two or three hours after he was taken prisoner and when everything was fresh in his (André's) mind would seem to be conclusive.

And, lastly, in regard to the allegation by the author of "The History of Westchester County" that André was not only not an honorable man but of a very volatile disposition I cite the following: A non-commissioned officer named Lamb, who served under Burgoyne and was taken prisoner at Saratoga, published in 1809, after his return to Dublin, a very interesting volume entitled "Journal of Occurrences During the Late War in America," marked by great shrewdness and keenness of observation. He gives many curious details of the Revolutionary War, not the least of which is a hymn from the pen of Major André, "written," says Lamb, "a few days previous to his execution. As the work is exceedingly rare, I here transcribe it from my copy. This hymn is well worthy of a place in our sacred metrical collections. The hymn, it seems to me, in its poetic grandeur, depth, and sublimity may not unfavorably be compared with Bernard de Cluni's 'Dies Irae,' a hymn which, as you are aware, at once took rank as the first of the hymns of the Middle Ages, and which has been compared by a German writer to 'a blast from a trumpet of the resurrection':

Hail, sovereign love, which first began
The scheme to rescue fallen man!
Hail, matchless, free, eternal grace,
Which gave my soul a Hiding Place.

Against the God who built the sky
I fought with hands uplifted high,
Despised the mention of His grace,
Too proud to seek a Hiding Place.

Enwrapt in thick Egyptian night,
And fond of darkness more than light;
Madly I ran the sinful race,
Secure, without a Hiding Place.

And thus the eternal counsel ran,
Almighty love, arrest that man!
I felt the arrows of distress;
And found I had no Hiding Place.

Indignant justice stood in view;
To Sinai's fiery mount I flew,
But justice cry'd with frowning face,
This mountain is no Hiding Place.

Ere long a heav'nly voice I heard,
And Mercy's angel soon appear'd,
He led me in a placid pace,
To Jesus as my Hiding Place.

On Him Almighty vengeance fell!
Which must have sunk a world to hell.
He bore it for a sinful race,
And thus became their Hiding Place.

Should sevenfold storms of thunder roll,
And shake this globe from pole to pole,
No thunderbolt shall daunt my face,
For Jesus is my Hiding Place.

A few more rolling suns at most,
Shall land me on fair Canaan's coast,
When I shall sing the song of grace,
And see my glorious Hiding Place.

WOMAN.

Sayings Wise and Otherwise from the Writings of Ancient and Modern Men and Women.*

In this volume are given somewhat more than one thousand quotations from the writers of all lands and times mainly concerning women. We give below some of the more striking of these sayings, but readers will find the entire collection quite as interesting perhaps as the passages here chosen:

The man who enters his wife's dressing room is either a philosopher or a fool.—Balzac.

A woman never commands a man, unless he be a fool, but by her obedience.—Turkish Spy.

Women know at first sight the character of those with whom they converse. There is much to give them a religious height to which men do not attain.—Emerson.

A man should choose for a wife only such a woman as he would choose for a friend were she a man.—Joubert.

Would you hurt a woman most, aim at her affections.—Wallace.

If woman did turn man out of Paradise, she has done her best ever since to make it up to him.—Sheldon.

When a woman pronounces the name of a man but twice a day there may be some doubt as to the nature of her sentiments; but three times!—Balzac.

Women know by nature how to disguise their emotions far better than the most consummate male courtier can do.—Thackeray.

The one who has read the book that is called woman knows more than the one who has grown pale in libraries.—Houssaye.

A beautiful and chaste woman is the perfect workmanship of God, the true glory of angels, the rare miracle of earth, and the sole wonder of the world.—Hermes.

The only true and firm friendship is that between man and woman, because it is the only affection exempt from actual or possible rivalry.—A. Comte.

The woman who is resolved to be respected can make herself to be so, even amid an army of soldiers.—Cervantes.

A woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well, but you are surprised to find it done at all.—Johnson.

Woman's power is over the affections. A beautiful dominion is hers, but she risks its forfeiture when she seeks to extend it.—Bovée.

No man knows what the wife of his bosom is—no man knows what a ministering angel she is—until he has gone with her through the fiery trials of this world.—Washington Irving.

If you would make a pair of good shoes, take for the sole the tongue of a woman; it never wears out.—Alsatian Proverb.

The highest mark of esteem a woman can give a man is to ask his friendship, and the most signal proof of her indifference is to offer him hers.—Anonymous.

It is difficult for a woman to keep a secret; and I know more than one man who is a woman.—Lafontaine.

The woman who throws herself at a man's head will soon find her place at his feet.—Desnoyers.

You see in no place of conversation the perfection of speech so much as in accomplished women.—Steele.

A fan is indispensable to a woman who can no longer blush.—Anonymous.

Women give entirely to their affections, set their whole fortunes on the die, lose themselves eagerly in the glory of their husbands and children.—Emerson.

In all ill-matched marriages the fault is less the woman's than the man's, as the choice depended on her the least.—Mme de Rieux.

Women divine that they are loved long before it is told them.—Marivaux.

There will always remain something to be said of woman as long as there is one on the earth.—De Boufflers.

Woman's happiness is in obeying. She objects to men who abdicate too much.—Michelet.

I will not affirm that women have no character; rather, they have a new one every day.—Heine.

An old woman is a very bad bride, but a very good wife.—Fielding.

Marriage has its unknown great men as war has its Napoleons, poetry its Cheniers, and philosophy its Descartes.—Balzac.

When women love us they forgive us everything, even our crimes; when they do not love us they give us credit for nothing, not even for our virtues.—Balzac.

Nothing is so embarrassing as the first tête-à-tête, when there is everything to say, unless it be the last, when everything has been said.—Roqueplan.

On great occasions it is almost always women who have given the strongest proofs of virtue and devotion.—Montholon.

God bless all good women! To their soft hands and pitying hearts we must all come at last.—Holmes.

The hell for women who are only handsome is old age.—Saint-Evremond.

The man that lays his hand upon a woman, save in the way of kindness, is a wretch whom 'twere gross flattery to name a coward.—Tobin.

Pre-Raphaelite Ballads.*

Four of William Morris's shorter poems have been bound together in a little book printed on good paper and decorated in that black and white style which but for Morris would probably not have existed, although he is not responsible for its varying phases. Pre-Raphaelite describes these ballads of "The idle singer of an empty day," for they have the haunting beauty, elusive in meaning, characteristic of that wave of thought and feeling which inspired Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and Morris himself. Take the refrain, "Two red roses across the moon." What does it mean? Is it only a chance song that captivated the knight with its recurring mystery? Or is it perhaps the crest of the lady's house? Suppose that it means nothing and eternly mark it worthless, yet can any one who has met it coming strangely back at the end of every stanza forget how it sings itself? Then the ballad "In Praise of My Lady" extols a woman whose hair and neck and eyes are so like the features of a Rossetti painting that one remembers instantly how Rossetti drew and painted the face of William Morris's wife again and again. Pre-Raphaelite also is the last ballad with its bright tourney, and gay, braggart laugh, "Hah! Hah! la belle jaune giroflee," and the gentle turn at the end where, as he is crowned, the victorious knight seems to see his lady's Quiet head bow'd o'er the gillyflower bed.

Whoever will may read, although perhaps not in this setting, for the edition is limited, and so it is to the ornament which surrounds the poems we must turn.

The poster is immediately suggested by the borders with which Mr. H. M. O'Kane has decorated this little volume of Pre-Raphaelite ballads. Broad patches of white on black ground are used boldly, and there is not a trace of the delicate intricacy which gives mystery to a pattern, except, perhaps, in the design where two roses blended on a crescent moon are repeated with sprays of leaves curving between. This is the best border in the book, yet three of the other four are attractive, and there is no touch of mediaeval seriousness in any one of them, which is well, for the lack of it forms a part of their right to be placed side by side with latter day ballads.

It is by four quaint illustrations, however, that the ideal Mr. O'Kane is seeking in decorative art is most clearly indicated. Something odd, and lately become fashionable, has happened to his figures of men and women. They are part Pre-Raphaelite and part poster, with emphasis on the poster, which last means that they have been treated as birds and flowers are when worked into design. Mr. O'Kane indicates, rather than draws, robes and limbs and hair. His rivers do not really look like rivers, but only stand for them, and while experiments of this sort are legitimate they are dangerous since they verge on affectation.

On the whole, in spite of many faults, (among them a proof-reader's error on the last page,) Mr. O'Kane is to be congratulated that his work has a quickly apparent charm, and that amid a multitude of pitfalls he has succeeded in giving Morris's ballads a suitable setting, for the first and last thing that strikes the reader is (whether Morris would like it or not) an atmosphere of fitness.

Capt. Humfreville's Twenty Years Among Our Hostile Indians.*

What strikes the reader of "Twenty Years Among Our Hostile Indians" is the poor estimate the author has of the Indian. The only merit granted to the redman is his courage. A fair animal is he, but beyond that he possesses no single trait to be admired:

There was in the Indian nature a trait of intractability not found in any other portion of the human race. Unlike the negro, he could not be enslaved. The Spaniard in the early days of discovery endeavored to enslave the Indian; the result was that he died in his chains. He was the same when I first knew him as he was then—unamenable to the law and impatient of restraint. So far he had shown himself incapable of even a veneer of civilization. He might be brought up in the midst of civilized surroundings and educated, but at the first opportunity he would relapse into his original barbarism.

The present condition of the Indians—the "wards of the Nation," as they are designated—the author thinks is not a happy one. Once they had arms, horses, and mules and hunted and lived on the choicest game. They have become "miserable specimens of humanity, with hardly enough to eat, not enough clothing to cover their bodies, and with inadequate means of shelter. The Indian population has been greatly reduced during the last forty years." Ideas as to the Indian population vary, since the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs disputes the generally accepted statement that the Indians are dying out.

The author thinks it is a mistake to believe that the Indians of the Far West have had any oratorical gifts. The untutored child of nature "can have no vocabulary." Then his ideals are materialistic. "The alleged masterful speeches at council fires and pathetic appeals to the justice of the white man, protesting against intrusion on Indian hunting grounds, belong to fiction, not to fact." But Capt. Humfreville of course is writing of the Indian of the plains—not of the Iroquois nor of Logan.

In various chapters Capt. Humfreville presents the traits, customs, and habits of the Indians. It was the Captain's experience to have faced in fight many of the various tribes he writes about. Sometimes to exchange shots with an enemy may engender mutual respect, but the author has no trace of liking for his once savage foe. There are chapters on the Sioux Nation, on the Comanches, the Apaches, and the various tribes. All the noted encounters between the troops of the United States and the Indians are graphically described. Full space is given to the battle of Little Big Horn and the wiping out of the entire force under the lamented Custer. That was the American Majuba Hill tragedy. The account of the fight with a band of Indians always was a close thing. The Indian was the superior of the white soldier as far as mobility was concerned. Far from his base, the cavalryman was as often as not half starved, and his mount in a worse condition than his rider. The adveatures of some of the noted frontiersmen are given. How the Overland Mail and the Pony Express worked their way through all dangers, chased for hundreds of miles by bands of Indians, finds a record in this volume. The prints are of unusual interest.

Mr. Finck's "Songs and Song Writers."*

The publication of books designed to lead to a higher appreciation of music goes merrily on, and in this good work the Scribners are conspicuous. The second volume of The Music Lover's Library, of which the first was published some time ago, now lies before us. It is Mr. Henry T. Finck's discussion of "Songs and Song Writers." This little volume covers a large amount of ground. Mr. Finck has aimed at giving a comprehensive survey of the field and one cannot help feeling that his motto was, "Let no song writer escape." For the information of the general reader this plan was by no means the worst that could have been devised. It enables the author to put before his readers a vast amount of information, which he would otherwise have to collect from a number of books. The work is a very clear and unmistakable expression of Mr. Finck's personal opinions of the songs and the composers whom he mentions. Those who are acquainted with this gentleman's writings on music are aware that he has little respect for conventions and less for the general consensus of opinion. He says what he thinks, and he says it with great frankness. A good many music lovers will find their pet ideas assailed with no little acridity by the author, and some of the canonized saints of music are treated with confident irreverence. No one can accuse Mr. Finck of leaning upon other musical commentators for his views. He is originality personified.

There may be some room for regret that the author of this work has made it so direct an expression of his independence of thought, for the reader will in some cases be forced into a controversial mood. But, on the whole, the volume will find a place for itself. Books on this topic are few and unsatisfactory, and we must be grateful for this attempt to fill what is really a long-felt want. The place of honor is naturally accorded to Schubert. Here Mr. Finck is at one with the judgment of the leading musical critics of the world, both past and present. Since the genius of Schubert was first recognized there has never been any material difference of opinion as to his mastership of the form which he established, namely, the art song. Mr. Finck very properly insists on the aesthetic value and superiority of the song composed through to that in which one melody does duty for the setting of all the stanzas. He calls attention to Mozart's "Veilchen," which is generally accepted by historians as the first real art song in the development of music, but he with equal propriety notes that Mozart's work was only experimental and that it was not accepted by his contemporaries nor his immediate successors as a model.

Loewe and the art ballad, of which he was the greatest exponent, are treated after Schubert. Mr. Finck finds that Loewe had genuine dramatic talent and that he showed it most eloquently in his harmonies and his accompaniments. The author believes that he was deficient in melodic invention, that he had enough melodic ideas to furnish forty songs, but not 400 which he wrote. Mendelssohn, the author finds, had sentiment only skin deep. He is never able to stir the soul, but is always graceful and pleasing. Mr. Finck gives a passing shot to the overestimation of Mendelssohn in England and declares that in that country Mendelssohn kept greater names off concert programmes, "as Brahms does to-day."

Schumann Mr. Finck praises as he deserves, though he naturally does not regard him as the equal of Schubert. He narrows Schumann down to some twenty masterpieces of vocal music, which will seem to Schumann's lovers a small number. The author's well-known admiration for Franz is warmly expressed in the many pages devoted to that writer. We are inclined to think that Mr. Finck is somewhat severe in his views as to the want of appreciation for Franz. His name has been familiar to concertgoers in this city for a good many years, and his best songs have been heard very often. It is quite certain that the man who wrote "Im Herbst" had the true genius for song writing. The author is well known as one of the most determined opponents of Brahms, and his criticism of that composer's songs will not astonish any reader. It must have given

REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D., SAYS:

"I have not been able to do much reading for the last two years, but when I had begun this book, I had to finish it.

"I was born and brought up in the central part of Maine, in a climate not unlike that which constitutes the atmosphere of this book, so I know it is true to life. It has the keen relish of the woods, the fragrance of the wild flowers, and is strong and clear as a northwest wind. Its characters are genuine and wholesome; and it is not only a pleasure, but it is an inspiration, to associate with them. The description of the battle scene is not surpassed, to my thinking, by any which I have ever read anywhere. There is no use in comparing it with other books, for it is quite able to stand alone and take care of itself.

"I congratulate the author on having written it, and thank him for the pleasure I have had in reading it."

"The marvellous success of 'Eben Holden' is as much a compliment to the great American public as to the author . . . 'Eben Holden' is a true book; it is pre-eminently a story of Americans for Americans. We have long heard calls for what should be the great American novel; here we have the nearest approach to it. In American literature we have now a perfect representation of a typical American character."

—PHILADELPHIA TELEGRAPH.

REV. JOHN LINDSAY WITHROW, D. D., SAYS:

"Of the story of 'Eben Holden' let me say: It fascinates and then satisfies. Free of the vice of pettiness, it is richly realistic."

REV. STEPHEN H. ROBLIN, D. D., SAYS:

"It is one of the most delightful books in our literature, so wholesome, elevated, natural and breathing such an atmosphere of truth. * * * May you and I be as worthy to live and as fit to die as 'Eben Holden.'"

REV. REUEN THOMAS, D. D., WRITES:

"I have read 'Eben Holden' from cover to cover and delighted in it for its vividness of character portrayal—its purity—its high artistic quality. It helps one to realize the times and the people—to live with them and love them. It deserves rank with the best books of its kind."

Mr. Finck a filip to hear the applause which followed Mme. Sembrich's delivery of two songs by Brahms at her recent recital.

Jensen, Wagner, Richard Strauss, and others are discussed by Mr. Finck, and then he takes up Liszt and Rubinstein, for both of whom he displays particular fondness. Tschaikowsky, Dvorak, Chopin, and Paderewski are also treated, and the author then says what he has to say about Grieg, to whom he awards a very high position. He writes of the French and Italian song composers and finishes his book with something about Americans. To Prof. McDowell he gives the place of honor among native writers, and couples him with Grieg as one of the two living highest masters of the art. The book is handsomely printed and embellished with portraits of several of the leading composers.

A Romance of Trouble.*

Ought Mr. Hervey White's "Quicksand" to be defined as the wail of human miseries? There are so few gleams of sunshine in the romance. Of all the personages there is barely a single one in the story who has not his or her hours of poignant agony. It is only Hiram Stubbs who is finally fairly happy, and then he has made the sacrifice of his life-long affections. The Hinckleys as a family must have been the victims of some unfortunate hereditary vice. They had lived in New Hampshire for years. They were honest, industrious, and pious, but their religion was of the narrowest kind. The first catastrophe was when the eldest daughter went astray. After that the Hinckleys became unfortunate. Adelaide's sin was concealed by her mother and father. They assumed the duties of father and mother to Adelaide's illegitimate child. New Hampshire was left, for necessarily there was a scandal, and a new home sought in Iowa. But misfortune follows the Hinckleys. There is a suicide, and the Hinckleys, or what was left of them, go to Kansas.

Possibly "Quicksand" will shock the feelings of many who follow particular creeds, for the author is not sparing of ridicule when describing certain ceremonies, such as that of immersion. Around Hubert, the son of the unfortunate Adelaide, much of the interest of this strange romance is centred. Through him the obstinate old grandmother hopes to bring about the regeneration of the family. Hubert is to be educated for the ministry. So that the lad shall go to college the whole family deprives itself of many necessary things. After graduation the young man marries, without the consent of the family, and, worse than that, is indifferent to religion. His wife turns out bad, and how it was brought about is a decided blemish in the novel. Hubert commits suicide. Some of the speculations in "Quicksand" are bitter when directed toward women.

Perhaps the title of this romance might as well have been "Quagmire." Having said our worst about the character of Mr. Hervey White's fiction, it would be unjust did we not comment on the literary skill shown, and we may express our regret that a more happy theme had not engaged the attention of the novelist.

A Twentieth Century Utopia.*

In his "Looking Backward" Edward Bellamy was probably the first person to voice the idea of a co-operative system of social reform resulting in an ideal state of existence, but Edward Bellamy is dead, and no steps have even been contemplated to so much as seriously consider the practicality of his ideas. To-day Bradford Peck again takes up the theme and advances his ideas and suggestions whereby the world may be operated on exactly the same principles, and with the same ease and facility, as an ordinary department store. Mr. Peck is a prosperous merchant of Lewiston, Me., and it is from the operations of his own business that he has evolved the plans whereby he would revolutionize the world.

Besides its purpose of giving publicity to Mr. Peck's ideas, the book is to perform the greater function of founding the Treasury Department of the organization which is to be known as The Co-operative Association of America, for all the proceeds of its sale will be given by its author toward this end, and all who are interested in the scheme, as graphically described by Mr. Peck, are cordially invited by him to contribute to the fund. The literary style of the book we cannot criticise, since its author makes no pretensions to any skill in writing, a fact which he distinctly states in his preface, but which is, nevertheless, easily discernible upon a glance through the book.

Mr. Peck's theories, however, we fear, are not practical. They sound well in the telling, but are not likely to operate so easily if put into active execution. Seen through rose-colored glasses, the scheme is one of marvelous simplicity, however, and calculated to result immediately in the eradication of the system of numerous trusts, by the establishment of one universal trust whose motto might easily be said to be "Each for all and all for each."

The principles upon which the organization is to be conducted are all clearly set forth in Mr. Peck's book. Every branch of industry is to be represented, each under its own individual head, but all under the common direction of the main executive officers of the association. There will no longer be "the old-style microbe breeding currency," but the distribution of wealth will be adjusted by the means of individual coupon books, each coupon representing different denominations of currency. Whenever a child is born his name is placed on record at the Treasury Department, and he is given a number and a book. The child is allowed an account of $120 per year, which amount is increased at stated periods until his graduation from school. By the time he reaches man's estate the corporation has placed upon him a fixed value of $1,500 per year, the amounts to be increased in accordance with the merits of each individual. Since the same principle is pursued in regard to the women of this Utopian period every member of the association becomes self-supporting from his entrance to his exit from life. Every child is immediately taught some trade, and upon leaving school is at once pressed into the general service.

We regret our space is so limited as to render it impossible to go into further details regarding Mr. Peck's remarkable scheme. He has not neglected any of the vexed questions of the hour, but with the utmost ease has met and mastered issues over which other men have labored for years. Not even the servant question has escaped him in his general solution of knotty problems. The volume includes many maps and pictures illustrating the simplicity of the construction of ideal cities upon the sites of some of our, at present, poorly constructed towns.

Mr. Peck's optimism already sees these changes effected within the next quarter of a century, but we trust we are not stamping ourselves misanthropical when we express a doubt that neither this generation nor even the next will live to see the American Co-operative System in active operation.

Morley Roberts's Latest Novel.*

If it be difficult to fix what is precisely Mr. Morley Roberts's point of honor as far as politics is concerned, the extreme brightness of his "Lord Linlithgow" cannot be questioned. The text bristles with the quill-like epigram. There is shown, too, a thorough acquaintance with the methods and the ways of great newspapers of London when important political measures are being discussed. As to the main episode in the romance, that has to do with the actions of Mr. Murray Harford. Murray was a young man of great promise in politics and trusted by the supreme head of the party, and so owed fealty to Lord Linlithgow. In the possession of the Radicals there were certain incriminating letters, and these were held by one Henry Pole. Pole had no right to keep these letters, which had been placed in his hands. Often asked to give up the letters, he had always refused. Pole knew that if the letters of Eustace Loder were ever made public the ruin of the Radical Party, of which he was the chief ornament, would follow. It is then that Murray Harford is, in a measure, ordered to obtain these letters. The task is a disagreeable one. Murray knows the precedents of Pole. They had been to the same college, and there had come about early antipathies. Pole refuses Murray's request. Then the emissary of Lord Linlithgow adopts other measures. He finds out that Pole, who is a married man, has a liaison with Lady Cradock. Murray makes that ugly thing serve his purpose. He threatens Pole with an exposure. As Pole belongs to that particular party which advocates the highest morality, he is frightened, and hands over the letters. Pole is, after all, a degenerate and given up to the use of morphine tabloids and brandy. The letters once secured, the triumph of Lord Linlithgow follows. The cant and rascality of the party to which Pole belonged all England acknowledges.

But what of Murray? His action? Does it savor of blackmail? What is blackmailing? According to the accepted definition it is extortion by means of intimidation. As a particularly bright woman in the romance expressed it, if Murray had used his fists, and knocked Pole down and then taken the letters from him by force, that would have been quite another thing. It would have been an action which most Englishmen would have applauded. Murray now feels qualms of conscience. He is in love with the beautiful Helen Lancaster, and that young woman is the soul of honor. She hears stories of how Murray obtained the fatal letters. She questions her lover's sense of right. All these untoward events affect Murray. He asks himself: "Do politics, like pitch, defile the man?" Does Helen's love for Murray waver? She has been brought up in a stiff and starchlike school. Many lies are told Helen by Murray's enemies. But love triumphs in the end, for Helen comes to him when he is suffering from something like brain fever and brought about by his mental worry.

As a political romance "Lord Linlithgow" is wonderfully clever. The author often has what the French call "le mot juste." Would not Mr. Hanna understand what is "the exact psychological moment" in politics? We read ever so much to-day about that necessity for sweetness and dove-cooing in relation to foreign politics. There was the party Pole belonged to, and "he would have carried international politeness to the point of national extinction." Are we to find fault with Mr. Morley Roberts because he writes about "the standard of invective attained in a Presidential campaign in the United States"? Can we deny the many ugly phrases which were bandied about but a month ago? Entirely apart from the merit of the political parts of the romance, the love episodes are of the prettiest.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS.

Ten thousand copies of Ralph Connor's Western story, "Black Rock," were sold by its publishers, the Revells, last week. More than 30,000 of his two books, "Black Rock and "Sky Pilot," have been sold. It has been made known before that Ralph Connor is the Rev. Charles W. Gordon of Winnipeg. But how did he happen to become "Ralph Connor"? How did he happen to write at all? The second question may be answered first. He was discouraged over the appropriation that had been made by a certain missionary committee for work in the mining camps of Western Canada. He went, disheartened, to the editor of The Westminster, a weekly published in Toronto. This editor told him to wage his campaign for the mission funds through his columns, and to do it in the form of a story. Mr. Gordon had lived among the people he wanted to help, so was able to tell of them with perfect confidence and fidelity. He wrote his first sketch. It is now the first chapter of "Black Rock." The editor was delighted with it. A name for the story was easily found. But what should the author be called? The signing of his real name at the time might have provoked criticism from the Mission Board—might not have been considered as in keeping with the conventions of the clerical calling. What name shall it be? The question was sent to Winnipeg. At the last moment a telegram came: "Sign sketch Cannor." Cannor? "That would not do," said the Westminster editor in telling of the event. "That would betray the face of a mask. He must have a proper name. But why Cannor? Perhaps the operator made a mistake. Should it be Connor? More likely. But he must be given a Christian name. What shall we christen this new-born Canadian littérateur? Frank, Chris, Fred? No, none of these would suit. Here it is, Ralph. Ralph Connor. And it was so. When he got his copy of The Westminster in Winnipeg that week, he saw the cross page heading 'Tales from the Selkirks,' by Ralph Connor. What he said to himself as the world was yet to know him, has not been told. No one was by to hear. 'I meant Cannor,' he wrote a day or two afterward. 'Ralph Connor isn't bad—rather Irish for me, but I guess I can stand it. I'll try to live up to it.' And so it was Ralph Connor was found."

In view of the cordial reception that Mr. Maurice Thompson's "Alice of Old Vincennes" is receiving as one of the best selling books of the day, the experience of a recent traveler in Indiana might be accepted as another proof of the old saying that "a prophet is without honor in his own country." In passing through the town which serves as the scene of the story the stranger spoke cordially of the tale to several residents. "Alice of old Vincennes," said one brusque old farmer. "What's her t'other name? I never heerd on her." It was explained that she lived only in the pages of a book. "Who writ it?" was the next inquiry. "Maurice Thompson," came the answer. "Maurice Thompson," mused the old man. "Dunno him. There's ol' Abe Thompson's boys living up the State, but I never heerd as there was a Maurice among 'em." "You don't read much?" inquired the traveler, gently. "Read?" said the old man, scornfully. "Young man, I raises corn."

Mr. Morgan Shepard of the firm of D. P. Elder & Morgan Shepard, San Francisco, has published a rather unique book for young children. The story was originally told to a "real, live little girl," and was received with such appreciation from that quarter that he has since printed it for the benefit of other little girls. "Mary Blue and Brown Man" is the interesting name of the little book, which has a sub-explanatory title of "A Bedtime Story for Little Ones." Mary Blue's wonderful experience with the gentleman in brown is quite the tale calculated to interest wide-awake young ladies of a tender age, whose bedtime has an unpleasant habit of coming too soon. The book is bound in exceedingly highly tinted Japanese cloth, profusely decorated in yellow and red chrysanthemums and green leaves, with a considerable sprinkling of gold.

As a souvenir of the woods in which the Brown Man resides, long, brown fibres, like the inner bark of a tree, are pasted on the fly leaf, while every page is decorated in quaint and grotesque sketches fully illustrating the wonderful rhyme. Its title page is a marvel of red and black, and a bookmark, consisting of a string of colored beads with an Oriental-looking coin attached, lends it a most mysterious air. The printing is the work of the Stanley-Taylor Company of San Francisco, and the text is in good, clear black type. The little volume comes boxed, and is sold for 75 cents a copy.

A curious story is being told concerning the facts which caused the publication of one of the most popular novels of the day. Some months ago Dodd, Mead & Co. heard that John U. Lloyd, a prominent chemist in Cincinnati, had written a rather remarkable story. He had no idea, however, of committing it to print. It had been composed purely as a solace and an amusement, and the manuscript was being bound to tuck away in his library, where it was to remain until his death. The publishers of course begged permission to see it. On reading it they immediately recognized it as a novel of great force, individuality, and interest. The author was unknown, and the risk may at first have seemed hazardous. The story was called "Stringtown on the Pike," and "serialized" in The Bookman. So deep was its effect that before the date of its publication in book form 10,000 copies had been sold—a remarkable feat for an author then almost unknown. A second edition was put on the press and sold within two weeks of the date of publication; a third and fourth edition were sold in the next weeks, while the fifth edition is now selling and a sixth is in preparation, all within one month from the date of publication. An explanation of the growing popularity of this book is doubtless the fact that, above all, the American novel reader is fond of characters that have human interest. We are told by the publishers that of the hundred or more notices, public and private, received by them but three are adverse, and these three amounted virtually to praise.

Mr. Richard Whiteing, author of "No. 5 John Street" and "Paris of To-day," who fell ill immediately after writing the latter work, is gradually recovering his strength. Although able to work again, he finds himself easily fatigued, and has to lay down his pen at frequent intervals. A change of air is expected to do much toward restoring his old-time vigor. His recent breakdown had its origin in overwork.

Lord Frederic Hamilton's editorship of The Pall Mall Magazine came to an end with the Christmas number, which is just issued. It is pleasant to read in it the following kindly good-bys to him:

The proprietor and those associated with the editorial and art departments of the magazine take the opportunity of recording their high appreciation of Lord Frederic Hamilton's services, and their regret, in which they feel sure that the readers of the magazine will join, at his relinquishment of a position in which he has done so much to maintain the best traditions of English periodical literature.

It might have been added—"and to copy from the great American monthlies their most conspicuous features."

We learn that Mr. Rudyard Kipling is trying his hand at a play, but the subject at present is "wrapt in mystery." The technique of the stage, however, is so different from that of the novel that it does not always follow that a novelist can easily become a successful playwright. Still, among others, Mr. Anthony Hope, Mr. Joseph Hatton, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mr. Jerome, Mr. Paul Leicester Ford, Gen. Lew Wallace, and Mr. Eden Phillpotts have done well, and Mr. Crawford is doing well at a second trial, whereas Mr. Zangwill and Mr. Gilbert Parker, M. P., have not been so successful. Mr. Barry Pain's play is still unfinished. Mr. Frankfort Moore has written some sparkling "curtain raisers," but his comedy of "Nell Gwynne," already produced in America, has not yet seen the light in London. Three "Poor Nellies" at once on the London stage would be a phenomenon.

Dr. Conan Doyle is taking a short holiday in Scotland, after delivering two thoughtful and interesting speeches in London at the Authors' Club and the New Vagabonds. The London Times gives an almost verbatim report of the first speech, but seems to have been scarcely fair to Dr. Doyle with reference to the Burdett-Coutts and hospital scandal part of it. Dr. Doyle was scrupulously careful to do justice to Mr. Burdett-Coutts, and to admit that the latter must, if necessary, have seen many hard things with reference to the treatment of the sick and wounded. "But then," said Dr. Doyle, "there must always be hard things in war." Mr. Burdett-Coutts says Dr. Doyle ought to have gone to the overworked commanding medical officer, Dr. Wilson, and have tried to get things remedied. The medical officer had so much to do that it was impossible for him to know all that was going on. When any abuse was brought to his notice, he at once did his best to put it right. All Dr. Doyle said was that Mr. Burdett-Coutts "did himself very comfortably." As a speaker, Dr. Conan Doyle is said to have greatly improved. This may be accounted for by his electioneering practice at Mid-Edinburgh, where he made fifty-seven speeches in one week.

The headline in a New York paper the other day, "Slain by London Hooligans," calls renewed attention to a book published in this country by Henry Holt & Co., entitled, "The Hooligan Nights." Hooliganism is the name applied to the actions of a band of hoodlums who operate in Whitechapel, London, and whose inspiring spirit, it is said, was Alf Hooligan, the hero of the book in question. It would appear, however, that young Alf was a milder type of Hooligan than that which is now terrorizing the east of London. But we remember that Mr. Clarence Rook, the author of the book, had much to say on the genus as a whole. He is now regarded as an expert on the subject, and, according to the London papers, is being pursued for advice by both the ecclesiastical and civil rulers of the city. "The Hooligan Nights" was a portrait of young Alf which has delighted many readers and has shocked many more. The deeds, however, described in it are mild compared with those now taking place among the panic-stricken inhabitants of London's great East End.

According to Mr. P. E. Roberts, who has just finished editing the second volume of the late Sir William Hunter's "History of India," there are still great opportunities for original work in the writing of British Indian history from the seventeenth century onward. The East India Company's "Court books," extending without a break from 1639 to the year of the suppression of the mutiny, he describes as "a mine as yet comparatively unexplored." These records are preserved in the India Office Library. The "mine" has already been partially explored by Sir William Hunter, for his narrative of events during the first Stuart Kings, the Commonwealth, and the Protectorate. It was Sir George Birdwood who, more than thirty years ago, first set the example of research among the original records. After him came Mr. G. W. Forrest, Mr. Pringle, Mr. C. R. Wilson, and Sir Henry Yule.

Persons who have read "Earthwork Out of Tuscany," and "The Forest Lovers," and "Little Novels of Italy" can hardly imagine the author to be a drudge in the British Civil Service. Probably, however, he is about as much of a drudge as Charles Lamb was under the same system. The appearance of Mr. Hewlett's "Richard Yea-and-Nay" revives interest in this author, but the recounting of his career will destroy the illusions of those who have grown envious while believing him to be an errant virtuoso in literature and art who could travel and work at times and places which proved most alluring to him. We are indebted to Mr. James MacArthur, the London representative of Doubleday, Page & Co., for much of the data of the following sketch of Mr. Hewlett's career: Maurice Hewlett was born in 1861. He attributes much of his literary bent and skill to his father, but speaks indifferently of the influence of school and college life. Most of his days were given to reading and scribbling, and he left Oxford without obtaining a scholarship. "I wasted my time," he says of this academic period. "I dreamed, I tried to do things too big for me, and threw them up at the first failure. I diligently pursued every false god. I don't think I was very happy, and I am sure I was very disagreeable. I doubt now if I was ever a boy except for a short period, when by rights I should have been a man." While still under twenty he went to London and applied himself to a steady grind at blackletter law—a study hereditary in his family ever since his great-grandfather left his Somerset home and settled in London, but one that was compulsory in Mr. Hewlett's case. In 1888 he married, and in 1889 was called to the bar. Subsequently his health failed, and an enforced tour abroad aroused in him a strong desire to enter the field of literature. Upon his return he began lecturing at South Kensington and University College on mediæval themes, wrote reviews, and in 1895 published his first book, "Earthwork Out of Tuscany," through G. P. Putnam's Sons. Shortly afterward there was issued a poem by him, called "The Masque of Dead Florentines," with illustrations by Mr. J. D. Batten. The year in which he received his Civil Service appointment saw another volume of poems from his pen, "Songs and Meditations," and yet another contribution inspired by the muse, "Pan and the Young Shepherd," was lodged with Mr. John Lane. But while the manuscript of the latter hung on laggard wing at the Bodley Head, The Macmillan Company published "The Forest Lovers," which at once caught the taste of the reading public on both sides of the Atlantic. This was in 1898. "Little Novels of Italy" appeared a year ago from the same house.

A short time ago we presented an extract from a letter written by Rudyard Kipling to Mr. Frank T. Bullen in response to a request that Mr. Kipling should write the introduction to Mr. Bullen's "The Cruise of the Cachalot." Mr. Kipling declined the invitation principally on the grounds that everybody who had a knife ready for him would take pleasure in sticking it into Mr. Bullen. Doubtless Mr. Bullen has appreciated the advice given, for his new work, "The Men of the Merchant Service," published by Frederick A. Stokes Company, is dedicated "To Rudyard Kipling in grateful recognition of both his wonderful genius and his great kindness to the author."

A short time ago a New York paper requested certain great men to write articles for it. Some declined to do so, among them Mr. Herbert Spencer, who sent a touching epistle as follows:

My state of health is such that I am able to do an extremely small amount of work. The task of bringing up to date such of my books as most need revision will probably never be achieved, and even the partial achievement will be made possible only by excluding all abstractions. Daily a large part of the little energy remaining to me is frittered away in correspondence, and I now find I must make the rule absolute against all letters save those of immediate personal concern.

This is very interesting. Unfortunately it is not new. Substitute the words "Mr. Herbert Spencer's" for the word "my," and we have verbatim et literatim a copy of one of the circulars which Mr. Spencer has been sending out from his home in Brighton for the last half dozen years. Doubtless there are many of Mr. Spencer's would-be correspondents in this country who have copies of the same document. There is, however, in some of them a personal touch, for the latest edition of the circulars has this paragraph added:

"Mr. Spencer hopes that this explanation will excuse him from giving a more direct answer to the communication of ——." Evidently the want of a shorthand secretary and typewriter has been most adequately overcome by the great English philosopher.

Somebody, it seems, has been accusing Mrs. Craigie of plagiarism. But, according to The London Chronicle, the accuser has curiously failed to grasp the plagiarism's point. One young lady says to another in "Robert Orange": "The great vice of the present day is bravura, an attempt to do something beyond the truth." A puzzled reader looked up bravura in Murray's New English Dictionary. But Mrs. Craigie had been there before him. For what did he see? To illustrate the use of the word was given the identical sentence that sent him there: "The great vice of the present day is bravura—an attempt to do something beyond the truth." And the reference at the end of the sentence was to a number of Blackwood's Magazine in 1815. The dictionary student was, of course, delighted with his discovery, and very respectably tolerant about the theft. But he might, had he looked closer, have seen in it merely the illustration of a favorite Disraelian method. If Disraeli found a sentence he liked in the Hon. George Smythe's speeches, he put it forthwith into the mouth of one of his "Coningsby" characters, and when the Duke of Wellington died his panegyric, delivered in Parliament, contained an acknowledged passage from a eulogy pronounced on a French General by M. Thiers.

Many Lovable Animals.*

Tenderly and gracefully the author of "Nigger Baby and Nine Beasts" tells of the love existing between a girl and various animals. It is for the most part in California, where the episodes take place. Some ten of the stories are so natural that they look as if they were the actual experiences of a young life. "Nigger Baby" is a splendid colt, and so named because of her color. It is the little girl to whom the colt belongs who breaks in the young creature. Nigger Baby worships her mistress, and returns all the caresses lavished on her. The family of which the little girl is a member is forced to move away, and Nigger Baby is sold. The colt is of a famous lineage, her dam having won many races. The colt brings a large price, but her young mistress is broken-hearted. The new owner of the colt is a young lady celebrated for her horsemanship. Nigger Baby is not happy. The colt mistrusts her new owner, and this want of faith is mutual. The young person who thinks she knows all about a horse does not like Nigger Baby's proud ways, and determines to subdue her. For the first time in her life, Nigger Baby feels the whip and the spur. The conclusion of the equine contest is that the young lady has a bad fall. Nigger Baby is not deemed safe, and is sold. Then an uncle of the little girl buys the horse and restores her to her first mistress, and there is joy once more.

There are lovable cats, burros, and bears in the volume. "The Yellow Tramp" is the story of a cat and its restoration to civilization. This paragraph found in "The Yellow Tramp" is fully worthy of quotation:

I have often wondered why so many of the inscrutable, wise actions of animals are recorded of mongrels and of the lowly ones in life. Perhaps adversity best develops rare and sweet intelligence. The human law doubtless holds good down in the other world. The petted, pampered ones require no keen insight, no subtle knowledge, in their downy existence, and Nature does not squander her gifts.

Rochester Impressions.*

Rochester, N. Y., must be a pleasant place to live and die in if Mr. Robinson's impressions of the town, as set forth in "Rochester Ways," could be borne out by the judgment of the author. Probably they can, but the attempt to do so would turn a most charming series of meditative, philosophical sketches into a guide book of trivialities. The quality of Mr. Robinson's work is fine, and whether he writes about a street procession, trolley cars, or a prayer meeting, his charm of diction is always present and almost forces one to believe that the affairs of Rochester, its landmarks, and the coming and going of its inhabitants, are of National if not of world-wide importance. To have produced and maintained such an illusion denotes a style of no mean literary merit. Mr. Robinson's Rochester is an elysium, and Mr. Robinson is one of its citizens. We know not whether he or Rochester should be envied the more. Possibly Rochester. However, it may be that the envy should be bestowed on Mr. Robinson; he obviously believes every word he has written.

Theatrical Biography.*

There is nothing new in the handsome reprint of the first volume of the well-remembered Actors and Actresses' Series of Messrs. Matthews and Hutton, except that the various biographical sketches of the Kembles and their contemporaries are illustrated with good reproductions of famous portraits. The whole series, in five volumes, is to be reproduced, and the new publishers seem to have begun their part of the work uncommonly well. The book is handsome, the type and printing as good as can be.

This volume contains biographical sketches of Cooke, Sarah Siddons, John Philip Kemble, Munden, Miss Farren, Dora Jordan, Elliston, the elder Mathews, Charles Kemble, T. A. Cooper, Liston, C. M. Young, Miss O'Neill, and Master Betty. Appended to each is a rich and varied selection of anecdote and criticism chosen from contemporary writers of the highest repute.

COLONIAL HEROES.

The Pathfinders of the Revolution.

A Story of a Famous Expedition in 1779.

By WILLIAM ELLIOT GRIFFIS, D. D.

313 pp. Cloth, $1.50.

The author chronicles the famous march of Major-General John Sullivan into central and western New York. The movement contained almost one-third of the whole Continental army, and its successes when compared with its losses seem almost incredible.

The author has carefully followed all the historical data procurable, and has made not only a most interesting story, but has portrayed a story rich in Iroquois Indian lore, and a charming episode set in a frame-work of one of the most striking periods of our Revolutionary history.

used to deplore the multiplication of books, and especially the way in which most of them were turned out—with cheap material entering into their manufacture, shoddy workmanship, and poor type. He used to insist that people should own few books, but that they should be great works and should be honestly made—that the paper should be good; that the print should be fair and inviting, and that the book itself should be an art work, while being thoroughly serviceable. Mr. Albert Brandt has evidently the Ruskin ideal in mind. His books, measured by Ruskin's rule are not excelled, if, indeed, they are equaled, by any publishing house in the New World."—B. O. NOTES AND NEWS.

Within one week after publication, the first edition of "Oriental Rugs," by John Kimberly Mumford, published by Charles Scribner's Son, has been exhausted. Owing to the time necessary in the color-plate work, the second edition cannot be ready much before February. It is quite astonishing that so many persons should be interested in the study of rugs.

The fifth edition of "Lyrics," by John B. Tabb, issued this week through Small, Maynard & Co., is the only one free from misprints.

"The Moriscos of Spain; Their Conversion and Expulsion," by Henry Charles Lea, is being published this week by Lea Brothers & Co. Since the elaborate essay of Dr. Michael Geddes, in 1714, there has been no attempt to present to the English-speaking reader a connected account of the long tragedy which culminated in the expulsion of the Moriscos from Spain in 1609 and 1610. Incidentally, the story illustrates nearly all the causes and influences contributing to the national self-destruction of Spain.

A new edition of Prof. Ernst Haeckel's "The Riddle of the Universe" is contemplated by the publishers, Harper & Brothers. The demand for the book, notwithstanding its philosophical and scientific style, is said to be steadily increasing.

The current number of Collier's Weekly is an elaborate Christmas issue containing an exceptional array of stories and illustrated articles written by well-known authors. In the pictures, the color work is especially noteworthy as illustrated by A. B. Wenzell in his pictures about the pathetic little Christmas story, "St. Gervase of Plessy," by Maurice Hewlett, author of "The Forest Lovers." There is also an exceedingly striking double-page picture in color by Howard Pyle entitled "The Flying Dutchman."

For the coming year, Bird-Lore will expound a plan for the study of birds designed to tell teachers and students just what to teach and just what to study at the proper season. Ornithologists throughout the country will contribute important articles dealing with those birds which may be best studied in certain months.

We are informed that, although The Macmillan Company has ceased to act as the publishers of the International Monthly, that does not mean that this periodical has been suspended. In the future all communications for it should be addressed to The International Monthly, Burlington, Vt.

The current number of The International Studio contains some very fine color work. There is a reproduction in colors of an evening effect at the Paris Exposition, by Henri Rivière; a reproduction in colors of a chromo-xylograph entitled "Tiger," by J. G. Battón. "The Windmill," by Edgar Wilson, is also reproduced in color. Among the articles are an appreciation of "A. D. Peppercorn," by the late R. A. M. Stevenson; "Garden Making, Second Part," by E. S. Prior, with thirteen illustrations; "Old Chased and Embossed Steel Work," by Starkie Gardner, with fifteen illustrations. The exhibition series is continued with an article on "Austrian Decorative Art" by Gabriel Mourey.

A second edition of Brooks Adams's "American Supremacy in the World's Politics" is just announced by The Macmillan Company. It is interesting to learn from The London Spectator that, although the subject of his book is the decay of England and the rise of America, it has received much praise from the English press for its impartial attitude.

Two thoroughly artistic books are in active preparation at Truslove, Hanson & Comba's of this city. One is an interesting reprint of "The Club; or, A Grey Cap for a Green Head," by James Puckle, with an introduction by Austin Dobson and fifty illustrations from the celebrated designs by Thurston, cut on wood by the foremost engravers of the early part of the nineteenth century. The second book is "Art Crafts for Amateurs," by Fred Miller, author of "Training of a Craftsman," with numerous illustrations. This volume is an interesting example of bookmaking, as the author's originality and practical knowledge are shown in his own illustrations extending even to designs for the cover.

There has just been added to The Macmillans' Library of English Classics a three-volume edition of "The History of the Valorous and Witty Knight Errant Don Quixote of the Mancha," by Miguel de Cervantes, translated by Thomas Shelton. The same publishers are also bringing out in two volumes Henry C. Morris's "History of Colonization from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," and Henry St. John Thackery's essay, "The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought," which was awarded the Kaye prize for 1899.

The current number of The Little Chronicle, Chicago's illustrated newspaper for young people, contains an article on "The World and the Weather Department," in which is an account of the typhoon which destroyed the Yosemite. There is also an article on "The Rise of the Tiber" and its results in the Eternal City. The commercial conundrum for the week is, "Why Doesn't the Flour Trade Get Its Share of Prosperity in Good Times?"

Doubleday, Page & Co. have issued for the benefit of their authors and would-be authors a little leaflet entitled "A Note to Authors on Some Technical Matters." Everybody who intends to write for publication should peruse this brief exposition of essentials. There is one provision which usually exists in the contract between publishers and authors which gives abundant excuse for the publication of the leaflet in question. It reads: "Expenses of author's corrections exceeding 10 per cent. of cost of composition shall be charged against the author's account." A proper observance of the advice given in "A Note to Authors" would make this clause unnecessary, for we have a full description of "Technical Matters," "Suggestions for Preparing Copy," "Proof Reading," "Galley Proofs," "Page Proofs," &c. The whole matter may be summed up in one sentence: Authors, prepare your copy, in accordance with accepted rules, as you would have it appear in print.

"The Protestant Episcopal Almanac and Parochial List" for the coming year has just been issued by Thomas Whittaker. It is a most convenient and valuable book for all those connected in any way with the Episcopal Church in America. Lists of the clergymen, churches, and parishes of the United States are given in full; there are, too, brief data concerning all Episcopal institutions such as colleges, hospitals, homes, settlements, &c. While convenient to the layman, to the priest it is indispensable.

There are two marked features in the édition de luxe of "David Harum." One is the book itself as a specimen of fine bookmaking, the other is the illustrating. The text throughout is printed in two tints. There are nine copper plate photogravures, and some seventy black and whites in half tone by B. West Clinedinst, and other text designs by C. D. Ferrand; they in their reddish brown tints have a softness and suggestion not found in the mere black and white reprints. D. Appleton & Co. have issued an artistic little leaflet descriptive of this edition.

The rapid growth of that class of literature known as "privately printed books" has inspired Cooke & Fry to extend their field and responsibility beyond merely taking the author's manuscript on one day and returning him a number of printed volumes on another. While the authors of these books are still glad to avoid the responsibility incurred as to the selection of paper, illustrations, type, binding, and general typographical make-up, they are, moreover, in many cases eager to be relieved of the responsibility of placing their books before the public. Cooke & Fry, therefore, will in the future give their attention to the sale or distribution of books published by them if desired to do so by the author.

A remarkable record is being made by "Wild Animals I Have Met," written by Mr. Seton-Thompson. The book now stands first on the list of Charles Scribner's Sons' "big sellers," 71,444 copies having been disposed of. This fact is, of course, a subject for congratulation to the author. But when we consider his theme and style, the American public is also to be congratulated. The fact that over 70,000 persons—more than read the average novel—have found joy in "Wild Animals" shows the prevalence of a most healthful literary atmosphere.

Whether through accident or by design, the way in which "Eben Holden," by Irving Bacheller, is being brought before the public is something new in the way of exciting curiosity and interest about a book. The publishers of the novel have just issued a leaflet which contains the critical opinions of men and women well known in American letters. Probably no piece of contemporary fiction has been honored to such an extent. Among those who have read "Eben Holden" and who are enthusiastic in its praise are William Dean Howells, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Mary E. Wilkins, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Ressiter Johnson, John Hay, John D. Long, Amelia E. Barr, Harriet Prescott Spofford, Margaret E. Sangster, Alexander Black, Sarah Orne Jewett, and others.

Longmans, Green & Co. are publishing this week a volume of sermons on Shakespeare, edited by the Rev. George Arbuthnot, Vicar of Stratford-on-Avon; "Stray Thoughts on Character," by Lucy H. M. Soulsby; "A Critical Examination of Irish History, from the Elizabethan Conquest to the Legislative Union of 1800," by T. Dunbar Ingram; a new edition, enlarged and revised in text and illustrations, of Ashton Rollins Willia_s "History of Modern Italian Art," and "The Book of the London International Chess Congress, 1899."

That Capt. Slocum's great adventure in "Sailing Alone Around the World" is appreciated in naval circles is shown by the fact that his book has recently been added to the list of works included in the crews' libraries on American men-of-war.

The approaching anniversary of the Louisiana Purchase lends a pertinent interest to Hezekiah Butterworth's new historical story for young readers which has just been published by D. Appleton & Co. under the title "In the Days of Jefferson." A number of striking and romantic events in Jefferson's early life have been utilized by the writer in a tale of considerable interest aside from its historical worth.

"Deacon Bradbury," Mr. Edwin Asa Dix's recent novel of New England life, touches the Christmas note in the concluding chapters, and may therefore be fairly included in the season's holiday books. Regarding the episode of the Bradbury girls making Christmas wreaths to be sold in the cities, as well as to decorate the house for their brother's homecoming, it is a fact that Vermont furnishes a large proportion of the enormous number of evergreens sold annually through the East during holiday time.

"Vaudeville and Other Things," by "Bunny," is being published as a handsome illustrated comic portfolio for the little ones by Isaac H. Blanchard Company. The book contains the well-known series of "The Champion Drummer Boy," "Rough Rider Sam, the Arizona Crack Shot," "The Champion Bread Cutter," and several others.

R. H. Russell will present early in January an exquisite reproduction of drawings by Albert Durer, with appropriate text by Fitzroy Carrington, under the title of "The Apocalypse."

A series of analytical readings under the direction of the John Prendergast School of Literary Training will be begun at 150 Carnegie Hall this afternoon, when an unpublished lyric poem, "Via Crucis," by John Prendergast, will be read and analyzed by E. Lyell Earle, Ph. D. This school has been established, it is said, "for the benefit of those numerous aspirants to literary fame who lack the practical knowledge and training necessary for the work they would undertake."

R. H. Russell will issue next week a souvenir of Mary Manuerfog in "Janice Meredith." Like all the Russell souvenirs, this will contain sixteen pages of heavy plate paper, filled with beautiful reproductions of Miss Mannering in scenes from the play.

An important scientific book, written in a popular way, is in active preparation at G. P. Putnam's Sons under the title of "The Method of Evolution," by H. W. Conn. This book is based on the fact that "during the last fifteen years the attitude of students toward this whole doctrine has been almost revolutionized by the unexpected results arising from the modern studies of heredity."

A very amusing number of Le Rire, whose famous issue of last year's "V" la les English" is still remembered, has just been received by Meyer Brothers & Co. This time it is entirely devoted to Oom Paul, and, of course, ridicules the English Army. Caren d'Ache is the artist. These publishers have also received the following books from Paris: Paul Bourget's "Un Homme d'Affaires," Gyp's "La Pais des Champs," S'Amand's "Napoleon III., (1862-3,)" Bentzon's "Tchelovek," Serao's "L'Aventureuse," Lavedan's "La Valse," Delano's "Supreme Pardon," and Montegut's "La Frande."

Items from Boston.

BOSTON, Dec. 6.—Miss Sara Hammond Palfrey's "King Arthur in Avalen," issued by the W. B. Clarke Company, is divided into three parts, the title poem occupying only the first eighteen pages, and being followed by "The Churchyard," a collection of verses literally memorial, being faithful sketches of the persons whose initials or names head them. James Jackson Lowell, one of those nephews, "Handsome and young and not too knowing," whom Lowell lamented; Lowell himself, Dr. Holmes, Longfellow, and Andrew Preston Peabody are among those here commemorated. The latter two-thirds of the volume are given up to miscellaneous verse, of which the strongest note is bravery, undaunted acceptance of life as it is, and brave hope for the future. There is some condemnation of war in general, and of the Spanish-American war in particular, but although the verses are not unwomanly no one would take them for a woman's verses, so simple and direct are they. Take, for instance, "Two Wishes," the first stanza containing the cry of the youthful poet, the feminine poet; the second, the author's own thought:

Nay, to live!—to serve God and man,
With warm hand and a dauntless breast,
Till the battle of life is won,
And never to dream of rest,
Till the whole of my work is done!
To stand in the field and reap
Till the sunset has gone to sleep,
And voices grow faint and few,
And my blood runs cold in the dew,
Till the twinkling beckoning stars are come,
And clear sounds the Master's call,
Then to follow the last of my comrades home,
With the fullest wain of all!

There is no doubt about the feminine element in a little book appearing almost simultaneously, Miss Katharine Eleanor Conway's, "The Way of the World and Other Ways." Nobody but a woman could hate the characters of her own creation as vigorously as Miss Conway hates the scandalmongers who almost drive her heroine into the grave. The story has attracted much attention among Irish Catholics, partly because many of the lesser personages are well-known men and women, their names barely disguised by the change of a letter.

Having started "Eben Holden" in pursuit of "David Harum," Boston tries another rustic novel in "Uncle Terry," by Charles Clark Munn. This is partly a story of the Maine coast, partly an account of a young countryman's adventures in the city, and the loves of a country schoolmistress and a young aristocrat. Uncle Terry sometimes indulges in a sententious saying, and a very good one it generally is, but the descriptions of the Maine coast and the two love affairs are the chief matters in the novel. It has one rather uncommon merit, in that it contains a little sermon to boys just beginning to earn money and prone to think it manly to throw it away, and, although plainly meant for adult readers, any Sunday school Superintendent will find it a highly salutary book for boys. The book is published by Messrs. Lee & Shepard, who also issue "On to Peking," by the indefatigable Mr. Stratemeyer, who sends one of his Philippine and Cuban heroes thither. The same firm issues "Plain Instructions in Hypnotism and Mesmerism," by A. E. Carpenter, a lecturer who for thirty years has striven to show that the two conditions mentioned in the title are produced by perfectly natural means, easily understood by any one. He hates Christian Science, and his last chapter attacks it vehemently.

The really important book, Capt. Mahan's "The Problem of Asia," will receive less than proper attention from the general reader until the holidays are over. As all of its three papers have appeared in magazines, this is of less consequence than if they were quite new. They are "The Problem of Asia," from Harpers, and "Effect of Asiatic Conditions Upon World Politics," and "Merits of the Transvaal Dispute," from The North American Review. The volume has no index, but it has a perfect table of contents analyzing each essay.

Capt. Mahan's publishers, Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., are also bringing out "In and Around the Grand Canyon," by one who for some ten years has been exploring the ground. It is profusely illustrated, and, although plainly issued as a guide, contains so much that is curious that it really should be read by all who profess to care for scenery.

"The Cardinal's Rose."*

"The Cardinal's Rose" is a good, old-fashioned, stirring story of mystery and adventure; old-fashioned, however, only in its plan, for there is an intense modernity in its method, the mystery being introduced by a cinematograph in a variety performance, and followed up in automobiles and with sundry fin-de-siècle inventions.

It is absurd to cavil at the probabilities in such a tale. All the reader has a right to demand is that the author shall take him well in hand and make him believe in the improbable, or, more correctly, in the impossible. This Mr. Sutphen does at once with a realism as splendid as that of his cinematograph itself. Unfortunately, we somewhat slip from his grasp as he unfolds the nature and purpose of that mysterious scene enacted upon the pier at Dover. One's imagination readily follows a daring flight into the unknown, or a skillful fitting of familiar facts in the strangest of mosaics; but it is hard to yield to the too-frequent requirement of recent romancers, to fly in the face of our school text books, and to wedge imaginary realms into our map of Europe and imaginary royalties into our historical tabulations. In "The Cardinal's Rose" we scent the crime as eagerly as Sherlock Holmes himself, but when it pretty well resolves itself into "a page of politics," and the most promising criminals become fairly good fellows, after all, our interest flags, and we wish Mr. Sutphen had proceeded upon his lines of a capital detective story without mixing it up with the distinctly tiresome affairs of Aetolia and Soulia.

Nevertheless, he has written a fine narrative, of penetration and of courage, and, it is needless to say, he has written it well. Moreover, although wholly original in its concoction, there is a delightful reminiscent aroma about it, as though there had simmered in it the literary equivalent of the bouquet of sweet herbs beloved by the chef. We distinguish the flavor of Poe; there is just a soupçon of "Called Back" or of "Oblivion"; and, certainly, Baron Herker's qualities are suggestive of that most charming of villains, Count Fosco. No word of "The Cardinal's Rose" is, in the smallest degree, an imitation, only an agreeable reminder of long-past and half-forgotten joys, adding to the pleasure with which one reads a well-conceived, and, upon the whole, a well-carried-out novel of intricate plot and of not a little "shuddery delight."

An Unfortunate Heroine.*

If the man with the "high-bred features" who wrote a signature on the register of the hotel at Patesville, N. C., had not assumed the name of Warwick, then most of the troubles tha author of "The House Behind the Cedars" describes would not have occurred. The so-called "Warwick" was John Walden, and through his veins ran negro blood. The romance Mr. Charles W. Chesnutt has written is a singularly distressing one. The theme treated is the not uncommon one of a handsome girl, John Walden's sister, who, on account of her negro origin, suffers all kinds of misfortunes. Mr. Chesnutt presents in an interesting way the claims of our colored brethren, and the injustice done them. The question of social equality is always a difficult one. The beautiful and well-bred Rene always seems to be out of place. George Tryon, the white man, falls in love with her; then by accident learns of her negro origin and breaks with her. Then comes the mulatto Jef Wain. Mr. Chesnutt has no liking for the man who is neither black nor white. There is no one faithful to poor Rene save Frank Fowler, the negro cooper. He finds Rene by the wayside, ill, bereft of her senses, and he cares for her during her last moments. True is it that: "There are depths of fidelity and devotion in the negro heart that have never been fathomed or fully appreciated." Mr. Chesnutt's two centres, around which the story revolves, are not far enough apart. In the episodes of action the personages are always stumbling over one another. Rene runs away from Tryon, and then falls right into his arms. When the man tries to evade the woman they come once more across each other.

A Good Historical Romance.*

The lady who writes "The Chevalier de St. Denis" is to be thanked for the moderation she displays. You may read ever so many chapters of the story and nobody is killed. To spit through a man per page is the modern habit of fiction manufacture. The temptations, too, were so great in a novel dealing with the times of Louis XIV., when Lauzun flourished. Taking the early Colonial period when the French held Canada and Louisiana, this affords Alice Ilgenfritz Jones the opportunity to present many historical personages. The hero, St. Denis, sees service in Spain, is made a prisoner, and is carried to Mobile. Then he starts afresh and goes to Mexico. When in France he falls in love with a Spanish woman, and the handsome Senorita de Villescas finally becomes Mme. St. Denis.

LONDON LITERARY LETTER.

William L. Alden.

LONDON, Dec. 1.—Nothing is yet known of the date of the appearance of Mr. Kipling's new novel. It will be called "Kim," not "Kim of the Rishti," and will appear in Cassell's Magazine, presumably somewhere about the beginning of the new year. Cassell's Magazine has lately been entirely remodeled. It was formerly of the shape and general character of the monthly parts of Chambers's Journal, but it is now a sixpenny magazine of the same size as the other sixpenny monthlies, of which it must prove a dangerous rival, as it is well written, well illustrated, and admirably edited.

Mr. Bernard Capes has published a new novel called "Joan Brotherhood." It has all the characteristics of Mr. Capes's other books. That is to say, it is a delightful story, with live people moving through its pages. Mr. Capes still adheres to his somewhat artificial style, and this is really the only blemish of the book. If he would write good, straightforward English, his books would be all the better for it. Juggling with words should be left to writers who can do nothing else.

Robert Buchanan still lies in much the same state as when he was first stricken. He can say one or two words, and evidently recognizes his friends, at least some of them. That he still survives gives some little reason to hope that his paralysis may be due to a clot on the brain, which will slowly absorb. Still, the chances of his recovery are exceedingly small, and his friends do not allow themselves to entertain any real hope that he will ever rise from his bed.

Mr. Alfred Austin some time ago made an onslaught on Mr. Kipling's poems, which he regards as vulgar and brutalizing in their effect. It is a pity that the de jure Poet Laureate should thus betray his dislike of the man who is recognized among all English-speaking people as the de facto Poet Laureate. Granting for the sake of argument that all that Mr. Austin says is true, he is nevertheless the last man in England who ought to say it. His criticism of Kipling's poems will be universally ascribed to jealousy, and it is to be feared that in this instance the universal verdict would be strictly true. At any rate, what he wrote about the Kipling verses was in extremely bad taste and worthy of Miss Corelli rather than of Mr. Austin.

Mr. Louis Becke has published two novels this season. The second of them, "Edward Barry," is a story of adventure in the South Sea, with a delightful mystery pervading the first three-quarters of the book, and plenty of bloodshed and adventure sprinkled all through it. It is eminently readable, and the reader will learn considerable of the ways of pearl fishers and of native divers. Nobody knows the Pacific as Mr. Becke knows it, and nobody writes of it in a more delightful way.

The Pall Mall Magazine has a new editor, Mr. Halkett, who is credited by the newspapers with the intention of rejuvenating the magazine. I fail to see how a magazine which is as young as The Pall Mall can need any such process. Mr. Astor has spent money upon it lavishly, with the ambition of making it the first illustrated magazine in England, and he has paid liberal prices to the best magazine writers. Whether the new editor will make any new departure in the conduct of the magazine remains to be seen.

By the way, Mr. Astor is soon to publish a volume of short stories. To my mind it is extremely creditable to a millionaire to spend his money in founding and conducting magazines and newspapers rather than in trying to build palaces, illustrating the fact that a man's taste may deteriorate just in proportion as his fortune increases. Mr. Astor also deserves credit for amusing himself with literature rather than with race horses and steam yachts. I have read more than one excellent short story written by Mr. Astor, and I trust that his new books will prove that he has written many that I have not seen.

One of the new novels that has pleased me especially is Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Richard Yea-and-Nay." Of course, as the title implies, it is a historical novel, but then no one need believe in the accuracy of its history, and therefore it is as interesting as if it were all pure fiction. In it the reader will find the same charm that fascinated the readers of "The Forest Lovers." Mr. Hewlett does not write exclusively for the young persons, and staid people who have not been case-hardened by reading women's novels may possibly find passages in the book that are rather plain spoken. But that will not injure it in the estimation of those who can appreciate the fine artistic instincts of Mr. Hewlett and his skill in telling a story. He gives to his stories the pure atmosphere of romance, the absence of which in many novels dealing with the age of knighthood makes them unreal. "Richard Yea-and-Nay" will doubtless be published in America. If it is not, the reputation of American publishers for knowing a good thing when they see it will suffer.

Mrs. Campbell Praed's "Watch in the Night" has decided merits. I do not like the Theosophical part of it, and it is rather late in the day to import that particular variety of rubbish into any novel. Still, there is much in the book which is clever, and the plot is well conceived and well developed.

The press has promptly recognized the unusual merit of Mr. Zangwill's "Mantle of Elijah." Although I greatly admire it, I am rather pleased to see that several of the critics find fault with the epigrammatic way in which some of Mr. Zangwill's people habitually speak. The epigram is the curse of the brilliant writer. He cannot be content to suffer his men and women to talk as men and women actually do talk, but he is perpetually representing them as saying smart things. We never meet in real life either men or women who constantly speak in epigrams. There may from time to time appear an individual who speaks in that way, but if so he is promptly killed by an intolerant and exasperated community. Why, then, should a writer sacrifice truth to his desire to write brilliant and quotable sentences? "The Mantle of Elijah" would be far better than it is if the people in it spoke as English men and women speak. It would not perhaps impress us with the same conviction of the exceeding brilliancy of Mr. Zangwill, but it would certainly impress us as a more artistic and better novel.

Perhaps the best-selling book of the season is Mr. Doyle's South African war book. It bids fair to rival the sale of Sherlock Holmes's adventures. This is due partly to the author's popularity as a novelist, partly to the subject of which the book treats, and partly to the conviction that Mr. Doyle is an intelligent man who can be trusted to tell the exact truth about things that passed under his own observation. This and Mr. Winston Churchill's book are far and away the best books that the war produced, and they will be accepted by the future historian as most valuable aids.

Mr. Richard Harding Davis has rubbed the British public the wrong way in his letters and magazine articles concerning the Boer war. No one objects to Mr. Davis's sympathy with the Boers. Like all other men he has a right to his own opinion concerning the matter. But it seems to be thought by his English readers that he should have hesitated before giving to the world as actual facts the absurd assertions of Boer men and women as to the conduct of British officers. To charge British officers while prisoners in Pretoria with habitually and grossly insulting Boer women is not the sort of thing that commends itself to impartial people of any nationality, much less to the British public. I am afraid that when next Mr. Davis visits London he will fancy that the climate has grown somewhat colder. In fact, he will probably find it very nearly arctic.

***

One of the London publishers has devised a means whereby books can have both cut and uncut edges at one and the same time. At least that is virtually what is claimed for his new device. There prevails a curious delusion that people like books with uncut edges merely that they may have the pleasure of cutting them. The true reason is that in England the book that is bound in boards is not considered to be bound at all, and every rich man who is fond of books carefully binds boards-covered books over again. This he can do, provided the edges are not cut, and that is the reason why so many book lovers insist upon having their books with uncut edges. I do not exactly comprehend the publisher's invention just mentioned, but unless it leaves books in a condition to be rebound it will not meet the exigencies of the case. W. L. ALDEN.

Lamb's Apology for Drinking Too Much.

A "hitherto unpublished letter" from Charles Lamb to his physician appeared recently in The Lawyer of London:

I should apologize to you and Mrs. A. for being absolutely carried home upon a man's shoulders through Silver Street, up Parson's Lane, by the Chapels, (which might have taught me better,) and then to be deposited like a dead log at Gaffar Westwood's, who, it seems, does not "insure" against intoxication.

Not that the mode of conveyance is objectionable. On the contrary, it is more easy than a one-horse chaise. Ariel in the "Tempest" says:

> On a bat's back do I fly
> After sunset merrily.

Now, I take it that Ariel must sometimes have staid out late of nights.

But then, you will say, what a shocking sight to see a middle-aged gentleman-and-a-half riding upon a gentleman's back up Parson's Lane at midnight. Exactly the time for that sort of conveyance, when nobody can see him—nobody but heaven and his own conscience.

I thought he would have let me down just as we got to Lieut. Barker's coal shed, (or emporium,) but by a cunning jerk I eased myself, and righted my posture. I protest I thought myself in a palanquin, and never felt myself so grandly carried. It was a slave under me.

My sister has begged me to write an apology to Mrs. A. and you for disgracing your party. Now, it does seem to me that I rather honored your party, for every one that was not drunk (and one or two of the ladies, I am sure, were not) must have been set off greatly in the contrast to me. I was the scapegoat. The soberer they seemed.

But still you will say (or the men and maids at your house will say) that it is not a seemly sight for an old gentleman to go home pick-a-back. Well, maybe it is not. But I never studied grace. I take it to be a mere superficial accomplishment. I regard more the internal acquisitions.

The great object after supper is to get home, and whether that is obtained in a horizontal posture or perpendicular (as foolish men and apes affect for dignity) I think is little to the purpose.

Neglect of George Eliot.

Mr. W. C. Brownell, in a remarkably fine paper on George Eliot, contributed to the current Scribner, observes that her name in these days is scarcely even the subject of literary allusion, and questions what has become of the vogue but yesterday so great. Granting, he says, that we have our own fiction of the day, all the great novelists, Thackeray, Dickens, Jane Austen, Reade, Trollope, Charlotte Brontë, every one but Bulwer and George Eliot still retain their old fascination. Leaving Bulwer quite out of the matter, he questions why this should be. "This neglect into which so little negligible a writer as George Eliot is fallen, is one of the most curious of current literary phenomena."

Mr. Brownell thinks this a most interesting question, this apparent neglect of a once popular author, particularly so as involving as well a consideration of the remarkable woman whose books are under discussion. He thinks that one reason for this neglect lies in the fact that people, both in and out of books, are less interesting from a purely intellectual standpoint than they once were thought to be. When George Eliot's novels were first given to the world psychological fiction had the charm of novelty, and for novels which keep us thinking all the time, novelty is an important element, because such stimulus is necessary to give the matter that zest that can alone sustain the close following of continuous thought.

That George Eliot stands at the head of psychological novelists, occasionally equaled, but within narrower limits, by Mr. Hardy, and in subtlity and fine shades of meaning by Mr. Henry James, no one will dispute. Mr. Brownell tells us that George Eliot's characters have a specifically intellectual interest, our attention being so concentrated upon what they think that we hardly know how they feel, or even if they feel at all. Her characters are always immensely interested in their own mental furniture, and do a lot of thinking. Her dramas are usually intellectual—the soul, the heart, the temperament, in fact, the whole nature, play a subordinate part. Her plots turn on what her characters think, being individualized almost entirely by their mental differences; their evolution is also mental; their change, development, or deterioration coming about in consequence of seeing things from a different standpoint. Their troubles are largely mental; even their courtships, like that of Esther and Felix Holt, being mainly an interchange of "views." Yet it must be allowed that it is the temperament, and not the mentality, of the characters of fiction which makes them completely and for all time interesting to us. Mr. Brownell says:

> Sociology rather than psychology is its auxiliary science—because, no doubt, sociology is hardly to be called a science at all. Thought is a universal and automatic process compared with feeling, than which it is far less idiosyncratic and particular. It is comparatively impersonal. It does not distinguish individuals with any oversalient sharpness. Other things being equal—which perhaps they rarely are, but that is nothing—people think very much alike. It has been remarked of the insufficiency of argument that a legislative vote was never changed by a speech. The mind is far less recondite than is generally imagined, except in so far as it is complicated by feelings. * * * The soul is always interesting, in its traits, its potentialities, its mystery, whatever its incarnation. It is permitted us to believe, but even if therefore the statement had been a supercilious supposition, George Eliot would have demonstrated its soundness—that there are many of our fellow-creatures whose minds hardly repay study.

One result of this undue attention George Eliot pays to the mentality of her characters is that in her novels nothing ever happens, or, at least, very much less than in the world of any other novelist of the first rank.

> Sometimes nature intervenes, as in the flood of "The Mill on the Floss." Sometimes there is a catastrophe of a human but impersonal order, as in "Romola." Nothing dramatic is evolved out of the action that is a resultant of the forces of character, for of these forces the intellectual only and not the passional have been elaborately dealt with. The infanticide in "Adam Bede" is a barely concrete excuse for the structure of moral analysis erected upon it. The intensest incident inspired by love—before George Eliot certainly a not neglected element of fiction—is the kissing of Maggie's arm by Stephen Guest: though the tragedy of this book is too splendid to suffer from any limitation, Mr. Frederick Myers notes that the only love letter in all the novels was written by Mr. Casaubon. There are whole chapters of mental analysis leading up to Dorothea's marriage, and the marriage itself takes place off the stage and is chronicled in a line. Nothing is more characteristic than the way in which the catastrophe of "Daniel Deronda" is treated. George Eliot leaves the telling of it entirely to Gwendolen.

George Eliot's characters are too speculative, too little imaginative in origin and suggestion, but while we cannot or do not sufficiently feel with them, yet they are perfectly original. Mr. Brownell says every one would have developed the same types upon quite different lines; no one else could have created these characters but George Eliot, "they being the travail of the mind, the incarnation of an idea, not the image of a vision." Of Gwendolen he says that we cannot help seeing the machinery of the author's mind throughout the process of her development, she being the result of logic rather than literature.

> She is an essay, with illustrations, on the egoistic girl to whom her own personality is of immense, of absorbing, importance, who counts wantonly on imposing it, and who "falls on dark mountains" and comes to infinite disaster, in thus following out the uncompromising law of her development, when she comes in contact and into conflict with the crushing forces of circumstances, and finds the world quite other than her pigmy and peremptory conception of it—finds it not only not ductile, but pitilessly despotic. Nothing could be finer than such an idea, nothing more interesting than the essay, with its incarnating illustration, in which it is expressed. * * * With all her characterization, * * * Gwendolen is imperfectly exteriorised. Always in exteriorization George Eliot's touch shows less zest than in examination.

Mr. Brownell says George Eliot's style is like the snakes of Ireland. Having thus no style, no one will ever read her for pure love of the reading. Her marked individuality, however, gives her a manner, characteristic enough, it is true, but which so lacks order and movement that it cannot by any possibility be called style; nor is it a happy manner. But of modulation, or of decoration of any sort, she shows no trace, the result being, as Mr. Brownell says:

> Thus there are no "passages," either "fine," or in any way sustained, in her works; at least, I think of none, and if any exist, I suspect they are put into the mouths of some personage with whom they are in character, in which case they would be sure to be very well done indeed. Every sentence stands by itself—by its sententious self. Therefore "the wit and wisdom" of the author are crystallized in phrases, not distilled in fluid diction. Their truth strikes us sharply, penetrates us swiftly; the mind tingles agreeably under the slight shock, instead of glowing in expansive accord and dilating with gradual conviction. Often these sentences have the force, the ring of proverbs—of those of Solomon, too, rather than those of Sancho Panzo. Some of them, on the other hand, have the air less of the sibyl than of "saws," and suggest the wiseacre more than the philosophic moralist. At times they have the trenchant crispness of La Rochefoucauld; at others, even in the novels, the unraveled looseness premonitory of the appalling Theophrastus Such.

Mr. Brownell thinks her environment largely accountable for the lines upon which the evolution of her genius proceeded. The intellectual side of Mary Ann Evans suffered in its harmonious development from Mr. Lewes's influence, her whole development seeming to have proceeded on lines increasingly inharmonious with her natural endowment. Her ardent temperament was suppressed instead of developed and controlled; her nature, which was sensitive to impressions, being trained and hardened by systematic reflection, and her unusually strong faculty of observation weakened by her becoming more and more of a recluse.

Mr. Brownell, at much length and most interestingly, reviews George Eliot's character and literary output, reminding us that she was—and to a typical degree—a woman; a member of the subjective sex, she was the most subjective of novelists, and that in any estimate of the woman and the writer this must not be forgotten. She was also a moralist, and one of the first class. So carefully has this paper been prepared that we would like to follow every phase of this essay, taking it up step by step, but we can only add Mr. Brownell's final summing up, which is as follows:

> But with whatever limitations, her position as a classic is doubtless assured. There are types of human character of which she has fixed the image in striking individual incarnation for all time; and her philosophy is of an ethical cogency and stimulant veracity that makes her fiction one of the notablest contributions ever made to the criticism of life. It is none the less true, to be sure, that her survival will mean the surmounting of such obstacles to enduring fame as a limited imaginative faculty, a defective sense of art, and an inordinate aggrandizement of the purely intellectual element in human character, which implies an imperfect sense of the completeness of human nature and the comprehensiveness of human life. But no other novelist gives one such a poignant, sometimes such an insupportable, sense that life is immensely serious, and no other in consequence is surer of being read, and read indefinitely, by serious readers.

The name of William Cotton Oswell, one of the mighty hunters and pioneers of African exploration half a century ago, is practically unknown to the present generation. With Livingstone and Murray he traversed African wastes previously impassable to Europeans, and discovered the River Zouga and Lake Ngami. Livingstone at that time—1849—was comparatively inexperienced, while Oswell had spent years in persistent travel and had become the most dashing and successful explorer of his time. Livingstone, with unresisting progress and a devotion to missionary labors, monopolized public attention, and by his frequent and elaborate descriptions of his journeys and achievements was constantly in the public eye up to the time of his death, in 1873. Oswell, on the other hand, shrank from publicity, could not be induced to prepare an account of his travels and experiences, and, notwithstanding his eminent services to geography, his work soon began to pass into oblivion.

He returned to England in 1852, and by an unfortunate combination of circumstances was prevented from resuming his career as an explorer. He saw service in the Crimea in 1854 and 1855, and then traveled extensively in North and South America and the West Indies. Marrying in 1860, he passed the remaining thirty-three years of his life quietly in a country village. He was not forgotten, however, as Sir Samuel Baker and other celebrated travelers and explorers recognized him as the pioneer African explorer and delighted in paying homage to his valor and skill. His wonderful experiences had to await his death before they could be chronicled. He kept no diaries and made a practice of destroying all his papers. Save with his wife and children, he had no regular correspondence, and he rarely talked of what he had seen and done. From this condition of things it can be seen that the preparation of this biography must have been a difficult task. In fact, it is surprising that so much material has been collected as is found in the present volumes. The narrative is mainly based upon the correspondence which passed between Oswell and his friends and relatives. These letters are quoted at length and are supplemented by such details of his life as the correspondence does not reveal. The brief extracts from the private journal of Livingstone, which are here presented for the first time, while interesting, are not sufficiently so to add particular value to this work.

To many this form of biographical record makes most unsatisfactory reading. It is, as a rule, wearisome, and notwithstanding there are here recorded tales of hunting that appear to border on the impossible and are most fascinating, yet we cannot but feel that it requires a perusal of too much uninteresting matter to get at the kernel of interest in the life story. If the deeds of this mighty Nimrod had been described in a brief story, shorn of all the family small talk and commonplace, we would have had a narrative which would undoubtedly have been of remarkable interest. The author of this work, with a sense of parental admiration and filial reverence, has prepared a memorial which will certainly be treasured by the intimate friends and admirers of William Cotton Oswell, but which will scarcely be considered a concise or attractive record of his life or which will find a place in the list of popular biographies.

Edmund Clarence Stedman.

Even at the Authors' Club it is no common occurrence to see assembled such a distinguished group of the exponents of literature and art as gathered the other evening to do honor to Mr. Stedman on the successful completion of his "American Anthology." The exercises were marked with that fine appreciation of the appropriate and the sympathetic which characterizes the words and actions of men who have achieved well-earned fame in literary toil. From the able and elegant address of Mr. Stedman to the words in prose and poetry uttered in his honor, from those present who sent regrets for their absence in well-turned phrases of esteem and cordiality, everything and everybody were in perfect keeping with the occasion. There was not a jarring note in the entire programme.

Mr. George Cary Eggleston introduced the guest of honor, who returned thanks to those who had deemed him worthy to be thus received, and to the makers of American literature in general, whose achievements had furnished him with a theme so attractive to him that he had devoted the leisure of an absorbing financial life to its exposition. Then Mr. Rossiter Johnson, Secretary of the club read letters from absent ones, which included tributes from the Secretary of State, John Hay; W. D. Howells, Judge H. E. Howland, James Whitcomb Riley, Edward Eggleston, Donald G. Mitchell, Prof. Henry Van Dyke, and Dr. S. Weir Mitchell. Then came the spoken tributes of those present: The reading of a poem by Charles Henry Webb and speeches by R. H. Stoddard, Mr. S. V. White, Ripley Hitchcock, and William Winter, who, in verse and prose, spoke of the poet's art and mission in general and of Mr. Stedman's attributes in particular. A sonnet, composed for the occasion, was read with much grace and feeling by Stephen Henry Thayer.

Among those present were George Haven Putnam, William W. Appleton, Dr. James H. Canfield, Richard Watson Gilder, Charles de Kay, Recorder Goff, Spencer Trask, William Ordway Partridge, Alexander Young, Duffield Osborne, Oscar S. Straus, Prof. F. H. Giddings, William Young, Henry Abbey, Alexander Black, Albert F. Houghton, Col. William C. Church, Cyrus O. Baker, Levi Holbrook, C. F. Mieletz, Winfield S. Moody, Prof. T. R. Price, Dr. Thomas L. Stedman; Prof. George E. Woodberry, Capt. A. T. Mahan, Frederick Dielman, the Rev. John W. Chadwick, F. Hopkinson Smith, S. P. Avery, C. E. Carryl, J. Wells Champney, the Rev. Robert Collier, Loyall Farragut, Easton Johnson, Thomas Moran, and Frank H. Scott.

Mr. Stedman has been stopping in town during the past few days making preparations for a trip to Bermuda—his first small outing in several years. He sails this morning at 10 o'clock.

D'Annunzio's "Fuoco."

"T. E. G.," New York, waxing indignant at Mr. Alden's friendly mention in his letter of Nov. 17 of D'Annunzio's latest book, "Fuoco," writes: "It seems strange that more serious denunciations of the book have not been forthcoming by English critics. In French they have been numerous enough. But, instead of this, we have a respectable and presumably relisble moral American reveling in its beauty, entirely ignoring its character, except in saying that it is 'not admirable,' and 'that regarded as a romance it is hysterical.' He points to, and is affected only by, the 'beauty of description,' the 'mystery and charm' of Venice! The 'poetry and sentiment' in the descriptions (which are perilously exquisite) are felt through the medium of the disgusting sensuality of the author as hero, and are to be found only by wading through his impossible thoughts and utterances, and seeing them only in this setting. That the scheme of this book, and its whole execrable conception, can be lightly disregarded, put out of thought by two words, 'not admirable,' and the beauty extolled to an uninitiated public, is a crime. 'Admiration,' though 'reluctant,' is a poor word for such literature! One longs for strength to righteously denounce it, or for a scorn which would shrivel it out of existence."

A new juvenile book comes from the music publishers, M. Witmark & Sons. It is entitled "Daddy Long Legs Fun Songs," and is illustrated. There are twenty little melodies. Each song is on a different subject. The volume has appeared in the large music and book stores. "Daddy Long Legs Fun Songs" is a juvenile book, good at any time in the year.

FRANKLIN SQUARE NEW YORK CITY

The Speech of Southeners and Canadians.

FRANCIS B. HAYES, New York, speaking of the distinguishing features of a Southerner's speech, writes: "There are three especially noticeable—his soft pronunciation of 'i' and 'ou' in such words as 'vice' and 'house,' the use of 'like' for 'as,' and 'do like I do,' for 'do as I do,' and his 'reckoning' where a New Yorker would 'guess,' and a Bostonian 'suppose' or 'think.' At least, this is a generally accepted rule, but some things have happened recently to discredit it in my estimation.

"I was in the home of some fellow-Southerners recently, and there met a young lady from Ontario, whose Southern-like pronounciation of 'ice,' 'like,' 'wife,' 'house,' 'south,' &c., caused remark. Several of us went to hear a lecture delivered by a Canadian scholar and were much impressed by the softness of his 'i's' and 'ou's.'

"In the current issue of one of our medical journals are articles written by a Canadian in which this expression occurs: 'The pus becomes thin and whitish, like it was at first.' That reads 'like' it had been written by a Southerner.

"It has been said that the English heard in Virginia and the Carolinas is more like the classic language of the Albion Isle than anything else spoken in this country. Can it be that the old English pronunciations and expressions are preserved in the Far North and the South, while the 'American' language has been developing in the more 'hustling' communities?"

Good Literature Always New.

S. T. K., Easton, Penn.: "I must disagree with Mr. Wilstach in what he says in his article on 'Two Kinds of Readers' in THE NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW of Dec. 1. He writes: 'Nearly all of our modern authors lack the essential style and literary polish which so distinguishes the writers of past generations.' This, I know, is a common complaint, but yet I mention it because Mr. Wilstach seems to have forgotten it; and this something which we call style and literary polish is necessary for any author who desires to have his name live. It makes no difference how new and original is the subject matter of a book, if these qualities be lacking then its fate is sealed; that is, it will have no standing in the ages to come. One cause, perhaps, for the crudities and eccentricities in our modern writers is a horror of being thought 'old fashioned,' but they do not seem to recollect that good literature is good literature whether written to-day or a century ago, and that the true literary man rarely caters to the popular demand.

"It may be foolish to refuse to read anything new simply because it is new, but, thinking it over, I am not inclined to blame Ambrose Bierce, whom Mr. Wilstach mentions, for doing this. In fact, Mr. Bierce redeems himself, in a way, for perpetrating on the public a collection of nightmares which is warranted to raise the cold shivers. I am referring to an early work of his also mentioned by Mr. Wilstach.

"Without wishing to be pessimistic, I fear that, in spite of the tremendous sales many of our publications receive, our age will be considered remarkably sterile."

The Exasperating Hero.

MARION JORDAN, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "Surely English novelists just now take no pains to make the heroes of their tales attractive. If we consider for a moment Mrs. Humphry Ward's Manisty in 'Eleanor,' Bernard Shaw's Trefusis in 'An Unsocial Socialist,' and Barrie's Tommy in 'Tommy and Grizel,' we will find at once three of the most exasperating men the reading public has been asked to consider for some time. We feel ready to cry out with one of the heroines, 'I hate men!' after spending a few hours with these three specimens of mankind.

"The pity of it is that, despite the cold selfishness of the first, the fickle inconsequence of the second, and the insincere poses of the third, each one is provided with two more or less lovable women who are perfectly willing, nay, almost dying, to have a chance to put up with their follies, whatever they may be.

"Manisty is a nervous, excitable, selfish man, who can be wonderfully charming at times and wonderfully sulky at others. He makes a fizzle of writing a book on Italian matters, breaks his cousin Eleanor's heart, and finally persuades an unsophisticated New England girl to burden herself with his self-willed power, practical weakness, his fastidious demands, his brilliance and folly.

"Bernard Shaw's Trefusis exasperates us along other lines. He deliberately runs away from his bride of six weeks because he says she interferes with his work, and six weeks of honeymoon is all he can stand. This, perhaps, would not prove more than the reader could believe if he had consistently retired to a spot where he could give himself up to days of uninterrupted labor. But when next we meet him he has camped next door to a girls' college, and under the disguise of a workman, to disarm suspicion, he flirts with the college girls in the intervals between his stirring up strife with the tenants on Sir John's land

"Barrie's Tommy is our old friend, 'Sentimental Tommy,' grown a fat and famous writer, but unable to draw a single sincere breath. Everything he does is a pose to produce an impression on some one. Grizel suffers from the beginning to the end of the book on account of his insincerity. When she cannot stand it longer she goes out of her mind and comes back to her senses to find herself married to an unselfish, though unloving, Tommy. But relief soon comes, for Barrie conceives the only fitting end for the 'exasperting hero,' and gently hangs him on a picket on the wall as he attempts to follow lady Alice—hangs him by the collar of the good doctor's coat, and hings him until he dies. It is always a comfort to have the punishment fit the crime!"

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.

"W. B. R.": "Where can I get a book called 'The Rescue of an Old Place,' which tells about an experiment upon an 'abandoned farm,' and please tell me something of its author."

Mary Caroline Robbins's "Rescue of an Old Place" is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. at $1.25. She was born in Calais, Me., in 1842, the daughter of James S. Pike, (later United States Minister to the Netherlands.) She edited, with Gail Hamilton, Wood's Household Magazine, 1871-2, and has written at intervals for leading newspapers and magazines. She studied water colors with R. Swain Gifford, and visited Italy in 1874-5 to pursue her work in art. She has since written on that subject and on landscape gardening. She is the wife of Dr. J. H. Robbins of Hingham, Mass.

"INQUIRER," New York City: "Will you kindly tell me something about Frances Hodgson Burnett? Was she not divorced within the last two years? If so, was she married again, and who is her present husband? Where is she now living, and does she still write under her old name? Also something about Amélie Rives; did she not marry a Russian Count after her divorce from Mr. Chanler? Where is she and does she still write for publication?"

Frances Eliza Hodgson was born in Manchester, England, Nov. 24, 1849, and removed with her parents to Tennessee in 1865. In 1873 she married Dr. Burnett of Washington, obtained a divorce in 1898, and married Stephen Townsend, an English actor, a year later. Her first successful book was "That Lass o' Lowrie's," a powerful tale of Lancashire life. Among her other works are "Little Lord Fauntleroy," "A Lady of Quality," &c. Her two addresses are Maytham Hall, Rolvenden, Kent, and 1,770 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C. Amélie Rives, (born in Virginia in 1863,) whose first husband was John Armstrong Chanler, is now married to Prince Troubetzkoy of Russia. She has written little in recent years.

Anne Isabella Thackeray, the eldest daughter of the novelist, was born in London June 9, 1837. She contributed to The Cornhill Magazine and other periodicals from 1860. She married Richmond Thackeray Ritchie Aug. 2, 1877. Her address is The End House, Wimbledon. She is the author of "The Story of Elizabeth," 1863; "The Village on the Cliff," 1867; "Five Old Friends," 1868; "To Esther," 1869; "Old Kensington," 1873; "Tollers and Spinsters," 1874; "Bluebeard's Keys," 1874; "Miss Angel," 1875; "Madame de Sévigné," 1881; "Miss Williamson's Divagations," 1881; "A Book of Sibyls," 1883; "Mrs. Dymond," 1885; "Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning," 1892; letter press to "Alfred, Lord Tennyson, and His Friends," 1893; "Chapters from Some Memoirs," 1894; "Lord Amherst," (with R. Evans,) 1894. She edited the latest edition of her father's works, and has written introductions to many books, including "Cranford," "Our Village," "Castle Rackrent," &c.

Funk & Wagnalls, New York City, $2.50.

"F. M. C.," Albany, N. Y.: "Can you tell me through your column, 'Queries and Answers,' where I may obtain criticisms, editorials, or any information in regard to 'light opera of to-day,' its composers, and merits, considered from a musical standpoint? I have De Koven's criticisms published in a late number of The Century, but wish for further information."

No book has been published on light opera, and our correspondent will be unable to get this information except as it may be gathered here and there from the files of old publications. Percy Fitzgerald operas, which may be had from the Lippincott's, (if not out of print.)

C. S. CAMPBELL, Owego, N. Y.: "In answer to the inquiry made by David M. Drufy, I would say that 'Bubbles from the Brunoen of Nassau' was written by Sir Robert Bond Head, K. C. H., born Jan. 1, 1793, in Kent, England. He served with the Royal Engineers at Waterloo and Fleurus. In 1825 he went to South America, and from what is now the Argentine Republic wrote 'Rough Notes,' describing trips across the Pampas and Andes, which gained for him the name of 'Galloping Dick or Galloping Head.' He was Governor of Upper Canada in 1835-1837, and put down the rebellion there in those years. His works are chiefly of travel, written in an amusing and graphic style. Besides the one mentioned above, written in 1833, his principal books are 'Life of Bruce, the African Traveler,' 1844; 'The Emigrant,' 1846; 'Stokers and Pokers,' 1850; 'The Defenceless State of Great Britain,' 1850; 'A Faggot of French Sticks,' 1851; 'A Fortnight in Ireland,' 1852; 'Descriptive Essays,' 1856; 'The Horse and Rider,' 1860, and 'The Royal Engineers,' 1870. Some time before his death, which occurred July 20, 1875, he was granted a pension of £100 for his services to literature. In answer to H. Scherer, New York City: John Hauvill, (Jean de Hautville, c. 1160-1190,) was a monk belonging to the Abbey of St. Albans, who distinguished himself as a writer of Latin poetry, studied at Oxford, traveled over a great part of Europe, resided a long time in Paris, returned to England and entered the Order of St. Benedict. His principal production is a kind of mock heroic poem, in which he describes the travels of his hero Architrenius, or Architthrenius, and satirizes the vices and follies of the world. The work was published in 1577, and is now very rare. Some specimens of his poetry are to be found in Warton's 'History of English Poetry.' Of John Wallis's 'The Tree of Life' I can find no trace. The Poem 'Good Cheer,' quoted on page 821, by 'F. C. F.,' is the motto of The Tribune Sunshine Society, and has motto of The Tribune Sunshine Society, and has that paper every day for four or five years. I have forgotten the author, but The Tribune has given his name several times. If this is a case of 'thought transfer,' it hung fire' a long time."

A number of books on this subject have lately been published in London, but most of them would have to be imported. THE SATURDAY REVIEW will give a list of these works if our correspondent desires. C. Hicks, (supplement to the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, July, 1900. $1.)

I also wish to obtain a copy of the Cambridge Bible for schools and a good Bible commentary."

Della Robbia.*

This volume is a credit to the series. The reproductions of Luca della Robbia's low reliefs are exquisite and suffer a minimum loss of charm through the absence of the color. The biographical part of the text is of necessity scanty, as there are few documents relating to the artist's life, and what there are show it to have been "a life of frugality and labor, without passions and adventures, except those connected with scientific discoveries and experiments." The catalogue of the works accomplished during the long, industrious working period is compiled with great care and is the fullest that has yet been given to the English public. "All the works attributed to the Robbias in the smaller towns of Italy are now for the first time scheduled and described," the author says, and there is a list of the unauthenticated and disputed works of the Robbia family, with the opinions of various authorities. Among these unauthenticated works is a medallion owned by the author and attributed by competent judges to Luca della Robbia himself, which has all the beauty of a composition by Raphael and much more individuality and interest of expression than are found in any but Raphael's earliest drawings. The illustration faces Page 60 and would in itself make the book a possession to be prized.

A supplementary chapter by the editor of the series defines Luca's position in Italian art, ranking him as a man apart, hardly to be compared with his contemporaries on account of the originality of his production. While he did not actually invent his famous process of enameling terra cotta, he discovered the method of applying the enamel to great surfaces of massive sculptures with almost perfect results, and after him, although his nephew continued to produce beautiful works, there were never any equal to his own in excellence. The "bottega" died out, to be revived in our own day only for "the mere copying of other people's ideas and without any original force at all."

"We can at this day hardly realize how great was that movement which we term the Renaissance," Mr. Williamson says, "or how far-reaching its results; but in the use of Luca's work to beautify the houses of Florence we see one side of its activities, that of rendering lovely even the most ordinary of the very streets along which people went. Luca's enamelled work was permanent, indestructible, clean, and unaffected by weather or storm, and all these qualities made it the perfect thing for its purpose that it was." And his inalienable love of beauty in form and spirit made his art the most endearing of his great century."

"To the Healing of the Sea," by Francis H. Hardy, published by Drexel Biddle, is said to be popular among the brokers of the New York and Philadelphia Stock Exchanges. Possibly the explanation is that Mr. Hardy, who was once a broker, has attempted to get even with some of his old friends on 'Change by writing them into a story.

Mrs. Earle's Volume on Stage Coaches and Taverns.*

Alice Morse Earle has added one more to her interesting series of books treating of the various phases of Colonial ways and days, all the more valuable as preserving for us the manners and customs of a period long since passed away, before its quaint customers and odd phases are entirely forgotten.

Mrs. Earle's book contains between four and five hundred pages, well printed on a glossy paper, necessary both for the text and for the full-page illustrations which add so thoroughly to the book's interest. These pictures are very numerous, covering all sorts of subjects, including reproductions of views of the taverns, Puritan ordinaries, inns, travelers' rests, and other designations for the hotels of those early days; many beautiful old signboards, taprooms, furnishings, flip glasses, loggerheads and toddy-sticks, cider jugs, and mugs; beautiful old hand-bills, old stage coaches, a one-horse shay, bits of landscape, and, in fact, a thousand and one old Colonial relics; two especially noteworthy illustrations being one of an old passenger pung, and of an old winter stage, which looks as if it might have been most comfortable in the intensely cold days with which our forefathers had to contend.

The text of the book touches upon all phases of stage coach and tavern experiences, describing old customs and ways, and weaving into the general account all sorts of old stories, both grave and gay.

Some of the laws governing taverns were of the oddest. These inns were not intended primarily for the convenience of travelers, being especially suited to the comfort of the neighborhood—a sort of club, in fact. Unknown travelers had to have their names given to the Selectmen, who, if they thought these strangers at all detrimental to the community, or likely to prove a burden upon it, had the power to warn them out of the neighborhood. In 1631 the Magistrates of Massachusetts Bay, in consequence of too much levity at weddings, passed a law prohibiting dancing on such occasions at public houses.

It seems odd to read in Mrs. Earle's pages that the use of tobacco in early Colonial days was regarded as far more degrading and wicked than was drinking. Both the planting and use of tobacco were forbidden, the latter being permitted in small quantities, "for phisick, for preservacion of the health, and that the same be taken privately by anncient men." No one was allowed to use tobacco in any public house, nor could any one take tobacco "publicquely," or in his own house, or anywhere else before strangers. Two men were forbidden to smoke together, nor was it allowable to smoke within two miles of the meeting house on Sunday. It is even more astonishing to read that in some New England towns, even a few years ago, smoking was prohibited on the street, travelers being greatly astonished on being asked to throw away their cigars. Drake, writing in 1886, said that he knew men then living who had been fined in the Boston courts for smoking on the streets; while in Connecticut in early days, a great indulgence was permitted to travelers—"A man might smoke once a day during a journey of ten miles."

Tavern-keeping in the old days was as much resorted to by women for self-support as is keeping boarders in our own time. The women of those early days were skilled in business matters and competent to manage affairs, so that we find record of many licenses being granted women to keep "victualing houses, to draw wine, and make and sell beer." These ordinaries increased so fast, however, that in 1675 Cotton Mather said that every other house in Boston was an ale house. While this was of course exaggerated, in the year 1714 that city, with a population of nearly 10,000, contained 34 ordinaries, 12 of which were kept by women; 4 common victualers, of which 1 was a woman; 41 retailers of liquor, of whom 17 were women, and a few cider sellers; so that the supply seems quite large enough in proportion to the number of the city's inhabitants.

By the close of the seventeenth century the word "ordinary" was passing out of use, all but a few old-fashioned folks calling such houses taverns—the word "inn" being very little used in America.

In the Middle Colonies ordinaries and taverns were as common as in New England, but in the South there were but few towns and villages, so that hospitality was general, every planter's home becoming an inn, freely opened to travelers, and without charge. But as early as 1668 so many small drinking houses existed in Virginia that laws had to be passed restricting the number in each county to one at the Court House, and possibly one at the ferry; the magistrates trying to restrict the sale of drinks to beer and cider.

The book contains interesting descriptions of New York City's inns, and especially of the New York City Tavern, 71 and 73 Pearl Street. After 1748 taverns multiplied in New York, the English rule being shown by the names of these taverns, "Thistle and Crown," "Rose and Thistle," "The White Lion," "The King's Head," and many others. "The Province Arms" was most noteworthy, as was "The City Tavern," which filled the entire block between Thomas and Cedar Streets. A picture of this house, taken from an old blue and white plate, supposed to date from 1826,

*STAGE COACH AND TAVERN DAYS. By Alice Morse Earle, author of "Home Life in Colonial Days," "Child Life in Colonial Days," and other social and domestic histories of Colonial times. (Long verse.) Fully illustrated. Pp. xvi.-449. New York: The Macmillan Company; London: Macmillan & Co., Limited, 1900. $2.50.

shows a man sawing wood on Broadway! This famous house was kept by two old bachelors, Jennings and Willard, the latter of whom was never away from his post, and even said never to sleep. When Niblo opened an uptown coffee house and garden it was thought a matter of courtesy that Willard should be at the housewarming. When the time came to start it was discovered the latter had not owned a hat for years, and that two blocks away from home had the effect upon him of being in a strange city. The New York Tavern, in South, now William Street, between Pine and Cedar, was the house of the first half of the eighteenth century. Here in 1736 a great ball was given in honor of the Prince of Wales's birthday, and so the book goes on, describing some of the best known tavern landlords, all over the country, the meals provided for guests, odd details of this last feature being taken from a journal of a trip from Boston to New York and return, taken on horseback in 1704, by a Boston widow, Sarah Knight, who also has much to say about other discomforts suffered at the inns of the day.

"Kill-Devil"—or Rumbullion—"made of sugar cane distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor," filled so important a part in the history of travels and tavern sojourn that it is not surprising to find two chapters devoted to Barbadoes liquor, or Barbadoes brandy, or brandywine, or rhum, to mention a few of its names. Increase Mather wrote: "It is an unhappy thing that in later years a kind of Drink called Rum has been common among us. They that are poor, and wicked too, can for a penny make themselves drunk."

Limitations of space forbid touching upon other interesting features of this book, so rich in historic interest, as, for instance, the gradual rise, development, and wane of the stage coach, which, in a wealth of detail, readers will find set forth in Mrs. Earle's pages, the interest of her text being only seconded by the beauty and value of its illustrations.

Early New York Houses.

Mr. Francis P. Harper of No. 14 West Twenty-second Street, this city, has recently published "Early New York Houses," with historical and genealogical notes by William S. Pelletreau, containing fifty full-page illustrations and a number of small vignettes of old New York buildings, both public and private, and a number of interesting head and tail pieces, all of historic interest, the latter being the work of Mr. C. G. Moller, Jr., whose sketches have added greatly to the interest and beauty of the book. One of these head pieces shows a number of the city's old church spires, its corresponding tail pieces showing old leather fire buckets. Other head bands show beautiful old candlesticks, old door knockers, old andirons, old lanterns of the most curious and elaborate patterns, and old warming pans, most of the subjects treated being rare specimens, which are of much historic as well as of artistic interest.

The book is issued in ten parts, all of which are ready for delivery, at $1 per part, or the completed work in cloth binding at the same price as for the parts, $10, the edition being limited to 300 copies. Twenty-five copies have been printed on Japan paper, with a duplicate set of plates, at $3 per part, both editions being sold in sets only.

The text is interestingly written and well printed, the full-page illustrations, in a brown tint, having been made by a new process requiring two printings. Mr. Pelletean has made early New York City the subject of enthusiastic study, his present notes being the result of long investigation of local history, the subjects chosen, both for description and illustration, being for the most part inaccessible to the general student, his principal aim having been to preserve to future generations accurate reproductions and interesting accounts of localities and buildings which no longer exist, but whose history is an interesting portion of our city's chronicle—one of his great objects being to point out exactly where ancient buildings stood, a point too often neglected in books of like character.

All good local history must of necessity be largely a history of families as well as of old customs and buildings long since passed away, so that this book should make a strong appeal to old New Yorkers, if only from a genealogical standpoint.

The parts are attractively bound in paper, showing sky-line silhouettes from the Brooklyn shore of the New York of 1750 and of that of 1900, while the entire work has been very properly dedicated to the memory of William Kelby, late Librarian of the New York Historical Society, "whose labors of careful, patient, and successful research have been equaled by few—surpassed by none."

A very dainty little volume has recently been issued of which there are 32 copies on imperial Japan paper and 170 on Holland paper. The title is "James Lyne's Survey; or, as It Is More Comonly Known, the Bradford Map," by William Loring Andrews. It is a reprint of an article published in The Bookman for July, 1900.

The author's introduction is a quotation to the effect that "Truth is the highest thing that man may keep," and on Page 28 he says, "To point out to others their mistakes is not an agreeable task." I feel convinced from the above quotations that Mr. Andrews will not take exception to a few corrections and also to some information on a subject to which he has devoted considerable scholarly research and imparted much information. I object, however, to the positive statement which he makes as to only one or two copies of certain maps and engravings being known, as it is misleading to the student and does not show sufficient research. The good people of New York City, cosmopolitan to a vast degree, sometimes are rather indifferent as to seeking information from outsiders, forgetting that our National pride in the greatest city in the Union would spur us on to accumulate much information which the great metropolis may sometimes overlook.

The map division of the Library of Congress, containing as it does over 60,000 maps and several thousand atlases, should be a field of research known to all students. For the specialist not to have explored its great collections seems an indifference which is incomprehensible. The map of New York City by Maerschalck, known as the Duyckinck map, which Mr. Andrews notices and reproduces in facsimile and of which he says: "This map is of even greater rarity than the Bradford map, as one of the two copies known is in a very imperfect condition," is in the Library of Congress in a very perfect condition, and the "Prospect of the Colledges in Cambridge in New England, by William Burgis," also in most excellent condition.

I refer to these two cases only, as I do not wish so much to criticise Mr. Andrews's various books as to bring to the notice of those interested in New York views and maps, some that I have recently examined in the Library of Congress. It is well known that the first view of New York City is found in a small anonymous pamphlet published by Joost Hartgers at Amsterdam in 1651. This pamphlet, exceedingly rare, should belong to every collection relating to early New York. Two views of New York are found in the first edition of Donck's Beschryvinge van Nieuw-Nederlant published at Amsterdam in 1655. One, an "inset," at the foot of the small map, and another in Page 9. The second edition, published the following year, has only the map containing the inset view and not the plate in Page 9. The title pages of both editions state "Met een pertinent kaertje van't zelve landt verciert," &c.

Mr. Andrews in his book entitled "New Amsterdam" says that "the (first) edition of Van der Donck, 1655, has at Page 9 a copy of the Hartgers plate. This edition contains (no) map. The second edition, 1656, has a map of Nova Belgica at Page 1, 12 by 7½ inches in size, with the view of Nieuw Amsterdam op t'Eylant Manhattans, in the lower right-hand corner." The words in parentheses in this quotation are the author's. The copy referred to is in the Lenox Library and must therefore be an imperfect copy.

The map of Vischer entitled "Novi Belgii" in the Library of Congress is unique as containing the date and place of publication, "Amsterdam, 1650." Asher, Muller, Andrews, and others give a presumable date to the original map between 1650 and 1656. Asher says, "this map is very scarce; in fact, I know of no copy in the hands of a private individual." The date of this Vischer map in the library settles a long controversy, and the inset view of New York City becomes the third known instead of the second as generally supposed.

I could devote many pages to describing the views by Allard, Montanus, Ogilby, Popple, and others, and some manuscripts of especial interest made during the Revolutionary times, but I trust that what I have already mentioned will interest the student of New York history and induce him to continue his research a little further than his own city.

THE CANAL TREATY STILL UNDER FIRE

ITS FATE SEEMS SETTLED

President and Mr. Hay Believe It Is Certain Great Britain Will Reject the Amended Convention.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON Dec. 15.—Friends and foes of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are agreed about one thing. There will be no treaty. The instrument negotiated by Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote and since mutilated in the Senate, and to be still further mutilated by sustaining the committee amendments that are considered already virtually part of the treaty, is not only not likely to be accepted as a treaty by Great Britain, but is intended to be so changed before it leaves the Senate that there will not be any possibility of its acceptance by the British Government. The President and Secretary Hay believe it is almost certain to be rejected by Great Britain.

All the votes taken thus far, as stated yesterday, go to make what the majority of the Senate describe as "a strictly American treaty." Senators who have voted for amendments in and out of committee admit that the adoption of the amendments threatens to render the negotiations that produced the treaty absurd, void, and of no effect. They also agree that after the treaty is ratified by the Senate in such shape as it may be given it must go back to the power with which it was negotiated. A respectful time will be allowed for the return of an answer.

It is not expected that the Salisbury Ministry will approve a treaty that denounces the Clayton-Bulwer treaty while pretending to modify it; that converts a plan for a neutralized canal into a scheme for a fortified canal, principally constructed for military exigencies, and that specifically rejects the proposition that the leading powers shall be asked to support us in maintaining a neutral commercial channel between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

The same result that is to be brought about after the Senate's manner could have been reached, it is maintained, by rejecting the treaty, but the programme as it looks to some Senators could not be satisfactorily carried out in that direct and comparatively inoffensive way.

DEFEAT FOR OTHER MEASURES.

Senator Teller said a day or two ago to a colleague: "We have three shelves waiting in the Senate for three important measures—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the Nicaragua Canal bill, and the Ship Subsidy bill." Two prominent Senators, speaking of this to-day, expressed the belief that the shelves would be filled in the predicted manner. One of these gentlemen said that he doubted whether there was any intention of agreeing to a treaty since a short time after it was submitted to the Senate. He expressed the belief that, while the Panama Canal Company was not strong enough to secure approval for the proposition to complete that work, it was influential enough, in company with the railroad corporations opposed to a canal, to bring about the defeat of any canal scheme whatever.

"When the treaty is shelved," said he, "there will come delay about the canal bill. The canal owl and the bill to develop the mercantile marine would follow each other naturally and as a part of a like scheme, but delay until after the holiday recess in the passage of any of these measures means that there will then be no time to dispose of them; they will be dropped for the session, and next year may be taken up anew or neglected, according to the sentiment that is found to prevail in the country.

It is considered to be just possible that abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty will be attempted after Great Britain has refused to give further consideration to the amended Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The expectation does not appear to be a sanguine one, and the almost unanimous opinion among Senators is that the ratification of the treaty, carrying the amendment adopted on the subject and the others ordered to be made by the Foreign Relations Committee, will mean the death of the canal question for this Session.

There is good Senatorial authority for the statement that there was no absolute necessity for postponing a vote until next week, but that there was a desire on the part of the supporters of an American treaty to ascertain through the press the effect upon the public mind of the action of the Senate in asserting an independent stand in the matter. The comment made upon this explanation by a Senator who disapproves of the extraordinary conduct of the Senate is that it is calculated to strengthen the growing belief in a settled policy of defeat to the principal measures now before the Senate.

The treaty will not be withdrawn. Neither the President nor the Secretary of State has ever had any intention of taking such action. After all the amendments that occur to the Senate have been made, the treaty will be submitted to the British Government.

FUTURE OBSTACLES.

Some of the consequences of the action now being taken by the Senate are becoming apparent. One of them is the view of persons close to the Administration that if America is to build the canal it may be necessary to adopt the policy for which Senator Elkins is clamoring—the conquest of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. These two countries have a constitutional prohibition against ceding any part of their territory. They consented to the construction of the canal on the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but would not go any further.

The State Department induced Nicaragua and Costa Rica to make protocols with the United States agreeing to negotiate for the canal and to adhere to the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. An attempt is being made just now to show that this provision was inserted in order that the protocols might fall if the treaty was rejected by the Senate. The truth is that this was the most concession that could be extorted from Nicaragua and Costa Rica. During the negotiations they stood out against binding themselves to anything more. They were willing to consent to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but to nothing which was indefinite or left a possibility of interference with their territory.

It is asserted that a plain intimation was given by these countries that to yield anything more would be to court a revolution.

Nicaragua and Costa Rica can of course be compelled to yield to the superior force of the United States. Their Governments will, however, be placed in the dilemma of choosing between making a resistance to the United States or violating their own constitutions and arousing a revolution.

THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

When the Senate went into executive session to-day Senator Lodge, (Rep. Mass.,) in charge of the treaty, made another effort to get a day set for a final vote on the treaty and the amendments to it which have been suggested by various Senators, but he did not succeed.

The proceedings consisted of a brief speech by Senator Teller, (Silver, Col.,) in which he suggested the substitution of the word "abrogate" for the word "supersede" in the first of the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the effect being to declare the Clayton-Bulwer treaty abrogated in express terms. He then made an argument in support of this suggestion, contending that any nation has a right to abrogate a treaty entered into with another nation. He said that if the committee intended the old treaty to be abrogated that word should be used.

When Mr. Teller concluded, Mr. Lodge renewed his efforts to get a time fixed for a vote. Senator Morgan (Dem., Ala.,) stated that if the time should be named for a vote on the treaty he would also insist that there should be an understanding that there should be a vote taken on the Nicaragua Canal bill at the same time. When, however, Mr. Lodge renewed his suggestion for fixing a time Senator Morgan said nothing further about a vote on the Canal bill.

Senator Allen (Pop., Neb.,) objected outright to the first proposition for a vote upon the treaty at a time to be named, and when Senator Aldrich (Rep., R. I.,) asked if a vote could not be had to-day on some amendments to the treaty, Senator Money (Dem., Miss.,) objected. He said that, being the only member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations who wholly opposed the treaty, he felt that he was entitled to ample time to state his objections, and added that he meant to state them if it became necessary for him to occupy the entire time between to-day and the date fixed for the Christmas adjournment. He said that if there was an effort to drive him he would undertake to occupy all this time.

Senator Aldrich responded that he had no desire to drive Senator Money or any one else, but that his only desire was to get the treaty out of the way of other matters.

At this point Senator Allen suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll was called. A quorum appearing, Senator Lindsay (Dem., Ky.,) moved to adjourn, but the motion failed by a vote of 20 to 30.

After this little flurry there was a general consultation among individual Senators, and when, on the motion of Senator Lodge, the Senate adjourned a few minutes later there was a good deal better feeling than had prevailed previously. After the session Senator Lodge expressed himself as confident of securing an agreement to vote before the holiday adjournment.

MORE AMENDMENTS OFFERED.

In addition to the amendments to the treaty suggested by the Committee on Foreign Relations, the following have been offered by individual Senators:

Amendment proposed by both Senators Elkins (Rep., West Va.,) and Penrose, (Rep., Penn.,) Insert at the end of Section 3 of Article 2, to follow the amendment proposed by the committee and adopted in committee of the whole, the following: But nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to prevent the United States from acquiring at any time sufficient territory and sovereignty over the same upon which to build, manage, operate, defend, fortify, protect, and control said canal, or for any other purposes of the United States may deem best in its own interests.

Amendment proposed by Mr. Beveridge, (Rep., Ind.)—Amend by striking out Article 3 of the proposed convention.

Amendment proposed by Mr. Allen, (Pop., Neb.)—To amend Article 1 by striking out the word "under" in line 13, Page 2, and inserting the word "by"; strike out the words "auspices of the" at the beginning of line 14 and the words "either directly" at the end of the same line, and by striking out the following in lines 15, 16, and 17: "Or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares," so that when thus amended the article will read as follows:

Article 1.—It is agreed that the canal may be constructed by the Government of the United States at its own cost, and that subject to the provisions of the present convention the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Amendment proposed by Mr. Tillman, (Dem., S. C.)—To amend by striking out the amendment reported by the committee and adopted in Committee of the Whole and inserting at the end of Article 2 the following: "It is agreed, however, that none of the foregoing conditions and stipulations of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing, by its own forces, the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

Amendment proposed by Mr. Butler, (Pop., N. C.)—Amend by striking out Section 7 of Article 2 of the proposed convention.

Senator Mason (Rep., Ill.,) gave notice of the following amendment, which he said he would offer Monday next, when he would address the Senate upon the subject:

"If the Government of the United States shall construct at its own expense the said canal, then nothing herein contained shall prevent the United States from protecting said canal in any way it may deem best for the interests of the United States."

OPINION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Foreign Office Officials, It Is Said, Are Inclined to Reject Any Changes in the Treaty.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—In view of the events in South Africa it is scarcely surprising that the public refuses to be cajoled into taking a burning interest in the Nicaragua Canal, in spite of the American cable dispatches, which break the records for length and seriousness. The London Times's correspondent to-day makes a passionate comparison between the present stage of affairs and that which existed at the time of the Venezuela dispute, and bitterly arraigns President McKinley and the Senate. Yet Lord Pauncefote has not cabled a word to the Foreign Office, which only heard of the vote on the Davis amendment through other channels.

Such pessimistic and indignant cable messages as most of the London dailies are receiving from their American correspondents find no responsive echo in Downing Street, where deprecation is freely expressed of these cabled efforts to apprise the British public of how badly the Senate is alleged to be treating their Government.

The Foreign Office officials, while expecting the treaty to be amended, were frankly surprised at the size of the majority, which served more than anything else to open their eyes to the fact that there was no truth in the cabled statements that the railroad interests were solely responsible for the opposition, or that irrational jingoism had suddenly become epidemic in the United States. There exists in the Foreign Office a sane appreciation of the American objections to building the canal and not being allowed to fortify it.

"Yet, at the same time," to quote an official, "we do not see why the treaty which we made with the people whom we believed to be the responsible representatives of America should be treated so cavalierly by the Senate. We do not regard the present issues as of any great importance, for we doubt if the Nicaragua Canal will ever be a paying investment, and whoever builds it, it will be of little use to England, either in peace or war. What we do regret is the apparent hopelessness of making treaties with a country whose Senate takes such opposite views to those it empowers to act in its behalf.

"There seems to be an impression in America that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was secured by the cuteness of the English representative and gave England an unfair advantage. That view has never existed here. In fact, rather the reverse. However, we shall not bother our heads about the matter till the Senate finishes its labors, and we receive the results through diplomatic channels. We are anxious to know what America really does want, and until we know, it is absurd to surmise what to do.

"However, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty worked satisfactorily for years, and as new treaties seem to cause dissensions in America, maybe it is just as well if we are obliged to revert to the former agreement, the bindingness and equity of which we have never for a moment doubted, in spite of the concessions in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

Although the mass of English comments on the Nicaragua Canal question undoubtedly represents the views of a large section of the public, it must not be considered in any way official, or even semi-official.

A special cable dispatch from Washington complains that the London dispatches dealing with the Nicaragua Canal do not give any indication of the views of Lord Lansdowne, the Marquis of Salisbury, or any person in authority. It may be said that Lord Lansdowne has been given every opportunity to communicate his views on the matter, but he has definitely refused, remarking that he did not wish to attempt to interfere, covertly or otherwise, in the formation of American public or legislative opinion. He has not even discussed the canal in his frequent conferences this week with United States Ambassador Choate.

Great Britain's decision, doubtless, will be arrived at only after a Cabinet conference. What Lord Lansdowne will advise his fellow-Cabinet Ministers to do depends entirely on the final shape in which the treaty is returned. As the matter stands, it would be equally unsafe to say he will counsel its rejection or acceptance, though, if he follows the ideas which at present prevail among the prominent Foreign Office officials, he will fall back on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and reject any modifications of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

LONE CHILD'S LONG JOURNEY.

Harold Gledhill, Aged Five, Shipped from England to an Uncle in Mount Vernon.

Special to The New York Times.

MOUNT VERNON, Dec. 15.—Harold Gledhill, a child of five, who was tagged in Manchester, England, and shipped to John Johnson, his uncle, who lives at 139 Stevens Avenue, Mount Vernon, is the youngest child that ever crossed the ocean alone. When the boy reached the Barge Office he had a tag attached to his coat addressed "Care John Johnson, Mount Vernon, N. Y. State, U. S. A."

Little Harold, who is an orphan, lived at 65 Drewsick Street, Manchester, England, with his aunt, who decided to send him to his uncle, a boss plumber here.

Passage for the youngster was secured upon the Majestic, which sailed from Liverpool. The boy, who was intrusted to the care of officials on board the boat, was known as the "King of Steerage."

Nothing was too good for the little one aboard the ocean liner. The women passengers, who had learned the story of the boy's life, cared for him on the trip across.

The Majestic reached its pier in New York City yesterday and Johnson was there to meet his nephew. The boy when he saw his uncle did not want to go with him. He wanted to stay with Mrs. Strucklen, the matron of the Immigration Bureau. After much persuasion the boy was induced to follow a passenger who had been kind to him, and when outside of the Barge Office he was taken in charge by his uncle, who gave him several toys. He then said he was satisfied.

AUTOMOBILE SOMERSAULTS.

Occupants Thrown in Opposite Directions, but Not Injured.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., Dec. 15.—While Frederick Parsons, a motor vehicle dealer, and Civil Engineer William B. Pierce were speeding in the outskirts of this city yesterday, their automobile ran away and turned a complete somersault in the air, landing upside down.

The men were hurled in opposite directions; but escaped the slightest injury. Strangely enough, the machine was uninjured and did not take fire. It was moving at a thirty-mile clip at the time.

DINNER TO MR. ODELL.

Senator Depew Entertains Governor-Elect in Washington.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Senator Depew gave a dinner to-night in honor of the Governor-elect and Mrs. Odell, who are making a three days' visit here. The additional guests were the Secretary of War and Mrs. Root, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Hitchcock, Mr. and Mrs. Timothy L. Woodruff of New York, Senator and Mrs. McMillan, Senator and Mrs. Elkins, Senator and Mrs. Wetmore, Senator and Mrs. McComas, Senator Hanna, Senator Kean, Mr. and Mrs. Screno E. Payne of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Audenried, Miss Kean, Miss Cockrell, Miss Patton, Gen. Corbin, and Lieut. John R. Edie, United States Navy, Miss Pauiding, niece of the Senator, doing the honors.

Senator Depew took this occasion to announce the engagement of Miss Pauiding and Lieut. Edie. They were naturally the recipients of the congratulations of all present. Mr. Edie is a native of Washington, was graduated from the Naval Academy in the class of 1890, and is now on duty in Washington. No date is mentioned for the wedding. It is likely to take place next Summer.

GREENWICH LIBRARY FUND.

Managers Trying to Raise $5,000 in Order to Secure Conditional Gift.

GREENWICH, Conn., Dec. 15.—Greenwich has a handsome library building erected by Mrs. A. A. Anderson of New York as a memorial to her mother, Mrs. Jeremiah Milbank. Now the managers of the Library and Reading Room Association are engaged in what will probably prove a successful effort to raise $5,000, the balance of a $25,000 endowment fund by Jan. 1, to make the library free permanently. When Andrew Carnegie lived here two years ago, he was a frequent visitor to the library, and after he returned to his New York home, he sent the Rev. Washington Choate, the President of the association, a check for $500 with which to purchase new books.

Shortly afterward Nathaniel Westerell gave the association a sufficiently large sum of money to enable the managers to make the library free for two years. There were then 82 subscribers at $2 per year. Just as soon as it was made free the list of those taking out books began to increase, and now it is 1,072. Not long ago a New Yorker, whose name the Directors will not make public, offered to give $10,000 to an endowment fund of $25,000, provided the balance was raised by Jan. 1.

Promises of $10,000 more were soon secured, among them $3,000 from John W. Hendrie, who died last month, and the managers are hopeful of raising the other $5,000 necessary. There may be a question whether they will receive the $3,000 promised by Mr. Hendrie, as he made no mention of it in his will, and the matter will be in the hands of the executors of the will, who are his two brothers.

PRIEST SAVES THE EUCHARIST.

Church Was Burning and Father Spigardi Risked His Life for the Host.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Dec. 15.—Father Spigardi risked his life this morning to save the Holy Eucharist from destruction in his burning church. The effort almost cost his life. He was rescued by the firemen soon after he had fallen unconscious in the middle of the church. In his hands he still clasped the ciborium containing the Eucharist.

The church was filled with smoke and flames when the priest arrived from his pastoral residence. He entered the structure boldly, wrapping his cassock about his head. He had obtained the object of his search, but was unable to retrace his steps out, as the neat had become intense and the smoke had filled his lungs. Pressing the ciborium close to his breast he attempted to escape, but was overwhelmed.

The firemen, learning that the priest was in the church, entered and rescued him. He soon recovered.

FIRE ROUTS HOTEL GUESTS.

Cold Weather Hampers the Firemen at a Fifth Avenue Blaze.

The six-story brick building, 1 East Fourteenth Street, and which, with the Hanover Hotel, occupied the Fifth Avenue block between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets, was damaged by fire last night to the extent of $35,000.

The firemen had their first experience with the cold weather. Soon after the water had been turned on it froze on the asphalt pavement on Fifth Avenue, making it exceedingly difficult for the horses of Water Tower Company No. 2 to pull the truck within range of the flames. After the truck had been placed some of the escaping water reached the intricate machinery used for operating the nozzle, froze there, and caused the firemen no little inconvenience. The hose of Engine Company No. 3, used for feeding the tower, became frozen to the pavement, and was released only after the firemen had chopped the ice with an axe. As the last piece was cut away the twenty men who were holding the hose lost their foothold and slid on the ice several feet.

The guests in the Hanover Hotel became greatly frightened at the volumes of smoke pouring through their windows, and many of them carried their valuables and trunks to the street. One woman, it is said, carried three trunks out of the building. Many of the guests were prepared to go to theatres. They rushed out of the place in their evening dress. The fire did not reach the hotel.

The damaged building is owned by the Blanchford estate. The top floor is vacant, as are the first, third, and fourth floors. The fifth floor, where the fire started, is occupied as a workshop by A. Popkin & Co., makers of mantels, and the second floor contained a quantity of furniture owned by Joshua Gregg, who once occupied the building.

BATTLESHIP ALABAMA HERE.

Successful Test of Sea-Going Qualities, and of the Big Guns at Sea.

The new battleship Alabama arrived in port and anchored off St. George, S. I., last night. She sailed from League Island, Philadelphia, Thursday afternoon to test the seagoing qualities, the turrets, guns, and other mechanical attachments of the vessel. The trip was most successful, the ship behaving splendidly at sea, while the test to the armament and engines showed them to be in good working order.

The Alabama left Delaware Breakwater at 11 o'clock Friday night in very thick weather, and until 4 A. M. yesterday morning encountered a strong northerly wind. The vessel was kept under easy steam at a speed of about 13 knots.

Between 10 o'clock A. M. and noon the turrets and guns were tested. The 13-inch guns forward and aft were fired eight times, two discharges from each of the four guns being fired. Capt. Willard H. Brownson, the commander of the battleship, said:

"The gun tests were in every way satisfactory. The turrets were found to be in perfect order, in fact, the entire mechanism of the ship worked perfectly. The behavior of the engines could not have been improved upon, and although a stiff breeze prevailed all day the Alabama made perfect weather."

The Alabama will probably go to the navy yard to-day or to-morrow to await orders and take on a supply of torpedoes. The ship is now practically completed, and will, in all probability, sail for the South in a few days to join the North Atlantic Squadron, under Rear Admiral Farquhar. Exclusive of officers, the crew consists of 500 men.

The funnels, instead of being fore and aft, as in the other vessels of the navy, are athwart ship, which gives the Alabama a distinct individuality. This battleship is a sister ship of the Illinois and Wisconsin. The armament consists of 4 thirteen-inch guns, 2 in each turret, fore and aft; 14 six-inch guns, 17 six-pounder quick firers, 6 one-pounders, also quick firers, besides 1 field piece and 4 machine guns. The ship is fitted with 4 torpedo tubes.

HARVARD STUDENT'S PLIGHT.

His Infatuation for an Actress Led Him to Disguise Himself and Get Arrested.

William Kibby, who says that he is a Harvard student, was arrested last night and locked up in the Clymer Street Police Station, Brooklyn, charged with masquerading on the street with a false beard. The arrest was made from the Amphion Theatre, where there is a company said to contain a young woman with whom Kibby was infatuated.

Manager Cohen of the company said that Kibby and five other Harvard students had met this actress in Boston, and that they had hired a special car for the past two weeks at an expense of $125 a week, and had followed the company over its entire route. Last week, according to the manager, five of the students returned to Harvard, leaving Kibby behind. Kibby visited the performances regularly until last Tuesday night, when, during a scene when the theatre had to be darkened, he lighted a match while sitting in the front row in the orchestra. Manager Cohen said that the young man was ejected from the theatre, and was told not to return.

Kibby, he says, tried again and again to gain entrance, but finding it useless, finally decided to disguise himself. He appeared last night at the theatre with a bunch of red whiskers attached to his chin. The ticket agent recognized him, and in the argument that followed tried to pull off the whiskers. It was found that they were glued fast. Policeman Power of the Clymer Street Station was called in, and on complaint of Cohen took the offender to the station house.

There it was found that the whiskers were so firmly affixed that they had to be removed gradually by soaking them with alcohol. Kibby was locked in a cell in default of bail, while the actress was looking for a bondsman.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 15.—Architect Bernard's revised plans for the projected University of California buildings have been accepted by the Regents.

They contemplate an expenditure of about $10,000,000. Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, the donor of the plan, says that work will be started soon on the mining building.

TELEPHONING WITHOUT WIRES.

Successful Experiments Carried on at Minneapolis.

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 15.—Telephoning without wires was successfully accomplished this afternoon by transmitting the voice across the Mississippi River near the Franklin Avenue Bridge, Minneapolis, a distance of over 1,000 feet. As a result the methods of telephoning now in vogue may be revolutionized.

One hundred and fifty feet of copper wire were strung in parallel lines on either side of the river. The first experiment was tried with five volts. Words could be as distinctly understood as over the ordinary telephone. Other batteries were then attached five at a time, finally cutting in twenty volts on one end of the line, with five on the other. The operator at the five-volt end could not only understand what was being said to him but could hear others talking on the bank of the river near the transmitter. The experiments will be continued Monday.

BRITISH LOST HUNDREDS

Four Companies of Fusiliers Captured After Ammunition Gave Out—Joubert's Son Among Boer Killed.

LONDON, Dec. 16.—The following report from Lord Kitchener was received at the War Office yesterday morning:

"Pretoria, Dec. 14.

"Clements brought in his force to Commando Nek, unopposed. The casualties were, I regret to say, heavy; killed, five officers and nine of other ranks; missing, 18 officers and 535 of other ranks. These latter were four companies of the Northumberland Fusiliers, who were stationed on the hill, and some yeomanry and other details sent up to support them. Names and nature of wounds are being telegraphed from Cape Town.

"Clements has come to see me. He says the four companies of the Northumberlands held out on the hill as long as their ammunition lasted. The Boer force attacking the hill was 2,000 strong, while another force of 1,000 attacked Clements's camp. By 6:20 A. M. the hill was carried. Reinforcements of one company of the Yorkshires failed to reach the top. Clements's retirement was carried out with regularity, but as many native drivers bolted, a considerable amount of transportation was lost. All the ammunition not taken away was destroyed. He reports that all behaved very well.

"Broadwood has gone to Rustenberg, and supports Oliphant's Nek, which has been reinforced.

"A flag of truce which has come into Commando Nek from the Boers says Joubert's son was killed, and further reports their losses very heavy."

Gen. Kitchener's supplementary dispatches confirm Friday's most pessimistic fears, and demonstrate that the catastrophe is among the worst of the war. The matter was brought up in the House of Commons yesterday, but the Secretary for War, the Right Hon. William St. John Brodrick, had no information to add, except that the wounded numbered six officers and forty-five men.

This astounding and utterly unexpected reverse, the news of which was broken to the nation exactly one year after Gen. Buller's defeat at Colenso, effectually disposes of any hope that the war in South Africa is nearly ended, and completely shatters the myth that the operations there were merely of a guerrilla nature. As Mr. Lloyd-George (Liberal) said in the House of Commons:

"This is one of the most severe reverses suffered by the British, and it is quite evident that the war will drag on for many months to come. De Wet is making England the laughing-stock of the world. We have 210,000 men in the field, yet we are unable to protect ourselves from disaster at the hands of small commandos drawn from a pastoral population."

What is somewhat coincidence the Northumberlands are known as the "Fighting Fifth." The Second Battalion, to which the captured companies belong, was one of the heaviest sufferers at Stormberg a year ago. The regiment has often been pronounced by home and foreign critics to be one of the finest in the British Army. All the forebodings and criticisms which Colenso gave rise to a year ago have been resurrected by the disaster at the Magalies Berg.

The War Office has nothing to do but "grin and bear it" and trust to time. Until Gen. Kitchener's forces are transformed into mounted infantry and the mounted police got to work, Mr. Brodrick sees little hope of improvement in the military situation.

Whoever was responsible for the surrender at the Magalies Berg is likely to suffer, for the new War Office officials are determined to make examples of Generals or any other officers guilty of gross mismanagement, or worse, such as that which, it would seem, must have occurred at this last defeat.

The public, apparently, is little affected by the fresh troubles. Soldiers are still eager to go to South Africa, the news from the Magalies Berg having resulted in offers from volunteer regiments to proceed to the front.

In contrast with the apparent insufficiency of the troops to master the situation in South Africa comes a revelation of the military resources at home still at the disposition of the Government in to-day's announcement that 40,000 troops will be sent from Aldershot to London to participate in Lord Roberts's triumphal entry on Jan. 3.

REVERSE FOR DE WET.

"Knox drove de Wet north to the Thaba N'Chu-Ladybrand line, which was held by our troops. De Wet's force, about 3,000 strong, made several attempts to get through during the day, assisted by a force of Boers operating from the north. These attacks were driven back, though some of the Boers from the south were able to get through the line."

Wiring later, Lord Kitchener reported that while passing the lines in the neighborhood of Thaba N'Chu de Wet's force lost considerably. The South African Light Horse and Thorneycroft's Mounted Infantry captured a fifteen pounder, taken at De Wet's Dorp, a pompon, several wagons with ammunition, twenty-two prisoners, and some horses and mules. A portion of the enemy had not been able to pass north.

DEMANDS BULLER'S PUNISHMENT.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The newspapers see prearrangement in the recrudescence of Boer activity everywhere, the object being to strengthen Mr. Krüger's hands, while the fact that the news of the Magalies Berg disaster comes on the anniversary of the battle of Colenso furnishes the editors with an excuse to demand the head of Gen. Buller.

The St. James's Gazette declares it has reason to credit The National Review's recent statement that Buller, after his first failure to drive the Boers from the Tugela, counseled Gen. White to surrender Ladysmith. This paper holds Buller alone blamable for the disasters of the Tugela campaign, and says:

"When comparable blunders occurred in the navy a court-martial immediately meted out justice. Why, therefore, should not the same rule hold good in the army?"

KRUEGER AND HOLLAND'S QUEEN.

Conversation After Dinner Friday on Agriculture and Ethnology.

THE HAGUE, Dec. 15.—The dinner given by Queen Wilhelmina at the palace last evening was private. Mr. Krüger sat next to her Majesty, opposite the Queen Mother and Dr. Leyds. Only the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting were also present. Afterward Mr. Krüger and Dr. Leyds conversed for half an hour with the Queen in the drawing room, mainly on agricultural and ethnological conditions in South Africa.

When Mr. Krüger was apprised of the contents of Gen. Kitchener's latest dispatch, chronicling such a great disaster to the British, he expressed the liveliest satisfaction and said he thought the fact that the news coincided with the anniversary of the battle of Colenso was an excellent augury for the Boers.

BERLIN, Dec. 15.—Count von Bülow is still bitterly attacked by a majority of the press on account of the non-reception of Mr. Krüger here. Evidently the anti-British sentiment is much stronger in the nation than the Emperor and Count von Bülow suspected.

BERNE, Dec. 15.—M. Manzoni, who introduced a resolution demanding that Great Britain accept arbitration with the Transvaal, announced to-day that the National Council declined to act thereon.

BOTHA TO SUE FOR PEACE?

LONDON, Dec. 16.—A dispatch from Standerton, Transvaal, dated Dec. 14, says that Gen. Louis Botha is at Ermelo, taking a peaceful attitude and informing the burghers that the time has come to submit to the inevitable.

It is expected that Botha will shortly make overtures for peace.

Great Crowds Will Greet Roberts.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—Thousands of people are preparing to invade London to welcome Lord Roberts home. The number of spectators of "Bob's" march to St. Paul's, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, on Jan. 5, is likely to break all records. The officials are already besieged for tickets for the thanksgiving service, and window owners are anxiously awaiting the announcement of the line of march.

Quakers to Ask Clemency for Boers.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The Society of Friends of the United Kingdom is about to memorialize Lord Salisbury, protesting against the burning of homesteads, causing great suffering to women and children, as a means of checking the destruction of railways or effecting the submission of combatants. This, the memorial will say, is a reversion to the inhuman methods of ancient and mediaeval warfare.

SANITATION OF BARBER SHOPS.

Implements Must Be Sterilized, Clean Towels Furnished, and Barbers Be Clean in Person.

Special to The New York Times.

MOUNT VERNON, Dec. 15.—Because several residents of Mount Vernon are suffering from "barber's itch," said to have been contracted in the city, the Board of Health proposes rigidly to enforce new sanitary measures in all barbers' shops.

According to Dr. George C. Weiss of the Health Board, an inspection will be made of each shop to see that all razors, combs, brushes, and clippers are sterilized in antiseptic solutions after each separate use. Among other rules, a separate clean towel shall be used for each person; the use of sponges is prohibited; every barber must wash his hands after shaving each person; all soap must be pure, and running water must be provided. Other regulations order the washing out of each shaving cup, the brushing of head rests, and prohibit the use of powder puffs.

A set of the rules must be posted conspicuously, and Inspectors will arrest all violators, who will be prosecuted for a misdemeanor. Some of the barbers say they will have to go out of business, as the rules are too stringent.

WANTS BACK CHURCH HE GAVE.

J. E. Scripps of Detroit Says It Was Understood that No High Church Services Were to be Held.

DETROIT, Dec. 15.—James E. Scripps, who built Trinity Reformed Episcopal Church, a handsome stone structure adjoining his home, at a cost of about $90,000, and who delivered it to the Episcopal charge of Bishop Davies of the Diocese of Michigan about three years ago, some time ago wrote a letter to the Wardens and Vestrymen asking them to return the property to him. This request has not been complied with, and Mr. Scripps has instructed his attorney to prepare a bill in equity to ask the courts to compel the Wardens and Vestrymen to turn the property over to him.

Mr. Scripps claims that the church was built and delivered with the understanding that no High Church services should be held therein. This understanding, Mr. Scripps claims, has been violated, and he has withdrawn from the church in consequence. He demands the return of the property in order that the services for which it was designed may be held there. The Rev. Walter Hughson, the rector, is now considering calls from Sandusky, Ohio, and Morganton, N. C., as a result of differences with Mr. Scripps.

POSTMASTER ON THE RACK.

New Orleans Paper Demands Resignation of J. R. G. Pitkin.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 15.—In a scathing editorial, an afternoon newspaper to-day demands the resignation of J. R. G. Pitkin, the New Orleans Postmaster, on the ground that he has violated the postal laws by sending improper matter through the mails. The case has attracted wide attention for a week past, and though the local papers have published none of the details, it has been the one topic of conversation in all the clubs for days.

It is understood that the paper referred to will take the matter up with the Louisiana Congressmen and Senators, and demand that he be dismissed. Mr. Pitkin has already been approached on the subject, and shows no inclination to give up the office.

Y. M. C. A. BUILDING DAMAGED.

Several Young Men Rescued from Burning Structure at Utica.

Special to The New York Times.

UTICA, N. Y., Dec. 15.—The fine building of the Young Men's Christian Association in this city was damaged $15,000 by fire, which was started by a match carelessly thrown aside in the basement at 5 o'clock to-night. The main entrance to the building was blocked by flames and smoke, and the thirty young men in various parts of the upper floors seemed for a time in great peril. Six who were exercising in the gymnasium, on the fourth floor, were taken from a window by the firemen.

One of these was a son of Congressman James S. Sherman, who slid down the extension ladder in his trunks and jersey. John K. Doan, Secretary of the association, crawled down the main stairs on his hands and knees, and on the way found a boy overcome by the smoke, whom he carried out. The loss is covered by insurance.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—Antonio Castic was struck on the head with a silver dollar on Tuesday night. It was thrown at him by Anthony Strasewski in the course of a quarrel. Castic is in a precarious condition at the County Hospital to-day. Blood poisoning has set in, and, according to the physicians attending him, death will result. DEVERY'S BIG SHAKE-UP OF THE POLICE

Two Deputy Chiefs, Six Inspectors, and Twenty-two Captains Transferred.

TITUS SUCCEEDS McCLUSKY

Defiance of President York, It Is Said, Inspired the Chief to Make the Changes—Hugh McLaughlin's Cousin Sent to Queens.

Chief William S. Devery "shook up" the Police Department yesterday, and the official seismic phenomena were acute and affected the Boroughs of Manhattan, the Bronx, Queens, and Brooklyn. In the upheaval two Deputy Chiefs, six Inspectors, and twenty-two Captains and Acting Captains were Capt. Price from the Grand Central Station to Elizabeth Street, the Chinatown precinct, not by any means an unimportant command. The transfer will, however, deprive Capt. Price of a district where the duties of looking after the traveling public are pleasant. The Sixth Precinct was, however, under the charge of a Sergeant, and there had for some time been talk of putting it in the hands of an efficient Captain.

Chief Devery arranged for the transfers with his chief aid, Sergt. John F. Flood, by telephone and at intervals, and some of the orders he sent, with the announcement for the public that the transfers were "for the good of the service" and that was all he would say about them, were countermanded. Commissioner Abell, who is classed as the Republican Croker Commissioner, was with Chief Devery on Friday night in private conference, and he admitted yesterday that they had discussed the changes and that he had suggested some of them, "in the interest of the service."

At first it was ordered that Capt. John W. England go from Central Park to One Hundredth Street, and Capt. Schmittberger from One Hundredth Street to Brenx Park, and Acting Captain Hammond from Madison Street to Central Park. After a long interval, which suggested that friends of Capts. England and Schmittberger had received a "tip" and interceded with the Chief, the orders in regard to them were countermanded, and Hammond was shifted to Bronx Park.

PRESIDENT YORK'S OPINIONS.

President York was not favored by the Chief in being furnished with a copy of the transfer list. When it was shown him by a reporter for THE NEW YORK TIMES he studied it closely, his eyes opening wider as he reached the bottom of the list, and he smiled grimly.

"I have nothing to say," he remarked "Ask the Chief about this. He does the transferring."

Mr. York would not entertain any question relating to Hugh McLaughlin and Deputy Chief McLaughlin. Afterward he made this statement, as speaking for himself alone:

"What, if any, reason there is for the transfer of Deputy Chief McLaughlin I do not know nor can I imagine. He has tried in every way to manfully discharge his duties, and in my opinion has succeeded very well, considering the difficulties surrounding him. The transfer of the Captains in Brooklyn precincts is beyond my understanding.

"Captains were sent back to precincts from which they were transferred some time ago because the conditions that then existed in their precincts were not what they should have been, and the results from the change showed the wisdom of them. If they are now sent back to those same precincts because it is expected that their short absence has improved their power of vision as well as their power to preserve better conditions in their precincts, I do not know.

"I do know, however, that the changes in the conditions brought about by Capts. O'Reilly, Reynolds, Leavy, and Driscoll in their precincts were decidedly for the better, and that better conditions have continued while they have been in the precincts.

"The power to make these transfers however, is vested in the chief executive officer of the department, and with him the responsibility rests. Time will determine the effect of them.

"As to the change in the Deputy Chief, in my judgment, this power rests alone with the Police Board. So that there shall, however, be no contention upon this point, I have communicated with the Corporation Counsel, asking his opinion as to the power of the board in this matter."

POLICE OFFICERS WILL NOT TALK.

Commissioner Abell possessed a complete record of the transfers when he was visited. He was in a facetious mood and declared that while he would not talk of the transfers, Chief Devery was wholly within his duty and powers in ordering them.

Inspectors Kane, the Grants, Brooks, Druhan, and Murphy, and the twenty-two Captains affected by the "shake up" would not talk of the action of the Chief. Deputy Chief McLaughlin refused to say anything in regard to it, but Deputy Chief Clayton said he was "pleased at the change." Those of the Chief's staff who did not suffer by his action were mute. First Deputy Chief Moses W. Cortright had little to say. "A good soldier obeys orders. I was not consulted about the transfers. That's the Chief's business," was his comment.

Capt. McClusky arrived at his new post, the Grand Central Sub-Station, at 5:45 o'clock last evening. He signed the blotter and then left, saying he would not return during the night. The Captain refused to say anything about his transfer.

President York said yesterday that Capt. Herlihy would probably be tried before Inspector Cross on the charges that ex-Judge W. M. K. Olcott is preparing. Inspector Cross has not yet retained counsel, but Capt. Herlihy will be defended by Louis J. Grant, who has acted in this capacity in 90 per cent. of the trials of superior officers within the past fifteen years, and has secured many reinstatements in cases of dismissal from the force.

Capt. Titus, the new Chief of the Detective Bureau, reached Police Headquarters at 5:20 o'clock P. M., and remained about half an hour. He was met by Sergts. Morris and Trainor, who were Capt. McClusky's right-hand men, and shown about his new quarters. Capt. Titus remained some time in what will be his private office, and then made a tour of the building, meeting a number of old acquaintances. Capt. McClusky had left before the arrival of Capt. Titus.

Capt. Walsh, who was sent to Wakefield, assumed charge at 6 o'clock. He turned out the platoon and made a brief speech, in which he introduced himself as a policeman, and asked the men under him to do their duty.

Capt. Price was seen last night at the Elizabeth Street Station. He said:

"You may say for me that you found me here at work. I have just taken a survey of the office, after a tour around the precinct, and enjoyed a look-in at those fine paintings of steamboats plying their way up the Hudson, which you see up there on the wall. Here's a letter in choicest Chinese rag-time, too. I can't read it, but if I had a flute I'd play it.

"That wedding last night you held off for me until I came here," he said, turning to Capt. Walsh; "but it's all right. I'll see the happy bride when the three days' grace are up."

Devery to Go Sure, Says McLaughlin.

Hugh McLaughlin, the Democratic leader of Kings County, was seen last night at his home, but refused to discuss the police shake-up. Later in the evening, when speaking to a close friend, he said:

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. Three things are perfectly clear to my mind: Death, the Day of Judgment, and Devery's retirement."

A Police Scandal of Gross Significance.

From The Brooklyn Eagle of Yesterday.

The transfers of Deputy Chiefs and of Captains in the Borough of Brooklyn, made to-day by the police authorities in Manhattan, are published in this issue of The Eagle. They have but one significance. It is that the gamblers, pool sellers, and maintainers of houses of vileness over here have secured the scattering of officers who tried to break up their business, and who did keep it in bounds, and that they hope by the changes which have been made to resume their pernicious activity without serious interference.

The men who have been "sent out" know why they have been "sent out." The men who have been "brought in" can hardly be under any doubts as to why they have been "brought in." The public opinion will be unanimous that these changes have been made to enable revenue from rottenness, under the sale of law, to be resumed here on the old scale, and that all chances he been taken on its resumption, e aroused moral sentiment of the people, and the oncoming of the Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Eagle will not be misunderstood when the remark is made that there is no reason to regret this proceeding. The proceeding will force the dullest or the most apathetic clearly to understand it. It cannot be mistaken. It means that the political powers in Manhattan, behind the police, who live on the marketing of crime and by blackmail upon protected infamies, are out of money, need it, and are bent on having the money which they need. Difficulties in the way of getting it in New York County have sprung up. A campaign for cash in Kings County has been ordered to occur, and may now be expected to occur, all along the line. We have little doubt that it will be carried on without serious denial, and with considerable success, until the men who are to profit by it have lost the power to carry it on, by the passage of new laws, or by the arbitrary removal of their tools who are now in place, or of the Mayor who put and holds in place the appointive officials who keep these tools in place.

Devery's defiance of public sentiment on the eve of election, for which Gov. Roosevelt called down Mayor Van Wyck, who, in turn, called down Chief Devery, was not more audacious and was less corrupt than is this act of transfer in this community to-day, under the circumstances which exist and under the purposes for which it has been made. The Governor of New York, who is still Theodore Roosevelt, certainly has the power again to call Mayor Van Wyck to account, and Mayor Van Wyck certainly has the power to call the Commissioners to account, who, in turn, have the power to call Devery to account for this abominable act.

We do not know that it will be well to do so. The people are within a few days of the coming in of their new State Government. The Legislature can, and should, pass a law to make such an abuse of police power, in the interest of crime and against the morals of mankind and to the shame of law, impossible. If the Legislature will not do that, then the people can call it to account, and the remedy will be in their own hands at the next election. We have little doubt the Legislature will follow the line of political interest in this matter, for it will also be the line of moral duty and of public approval. We know of no honest Democrats who will not rejoice, if a Republican Legislature and a Republican Governor can be made the instrument of smashing the régime of corruption, which is called the present Police Department of the City of New York.

While we are on the political aspects of this subject, and, as it is a matter of government, politics must be regarded as necessarily connected with it, we wish to say that the Democratic organization of Kings County was represented by, and did secure, the appointment of the men who have been transferred, and was represented by, and did promote, the decent action which they took here to drive crime to cover, and to break up the alliance between infamy and Government that has now been flauntingly renewed. If the Democratic organization here is true to its instincts and to its interests, it will protest against this flaunting renewal of the sale of law and of the prostitution of justice, and it will carry its protest not merely to the limit of party action, but, if necessary, beyond it.

It cannot line up with Tammany for infamy without going down with Tammany in infamy. We do not believe it will be willing to do so, and we shall hope that it will have the courage not to do so. That, however, is for the organization to determine. Its determination will not affect the action of the people, unless that determination be in line with their action and with their intention, and their action and their intention are to destroy, root and branch, the conditions and the men that have defied decency in Brooklyn, punished honest police officers here for doing right, and brought in instruments that are expected to be pliable enough to make government mean the same as crime for the enrichment of politicians and for the lucrative annexation of vice as an annex to administration in this community of churches and of homes, which is alike the most moral and the most independent collection of human beings on whom the sun shines to-day.

The worst or the boldest was perhaps desirable. It has come. Now let the recoil be awaited with confidence by the decent and the honest and not without terror by the criminal or the weak. For the recoil which has been challenged cannot be prevented, and, when it comes, it cannot be withstood or allayed.

IRISH BRIGADE BANQUET.

Col. Lynch Wants to Debate on South Africa with Lieut. Churchill.

The annual banquet of Meagher's Irish Brigade Association was held last evening at the Sturtevant House. The brigade included the Sixty-ninth, Sixty-third, and Eighty-eighth New York Volunteers, and later on the One Hundred and Sixteenth Pennsylvania and the Twenty-eighth Massachusetts. Capt. O'Connell presided. Col. Arthur Lynch, commander of the Second Irish Brigade in the Boer army, was one of the guests. When introduced Col. Lynch made an address, in which he said:

"I estimate that at the present time the Boers have 15,000 men in the field at least. It would appear, also, that the Boer forces are being reinforced. If that is true, the reinforcements must come from the Afrikander population in the British colonies. And if it really is true that they are taking the field, England will never overcome them."

Col. Lynch, during the evening, announced his intention of challenging Winston Spencer Churchill to a joint debate of the issues involved in the South African war, to take place in Cooper Union or other place to be agreed on.

SAYS TRAINMEN WILL STRIKE.

Telegrapher Declares Santa Fe Men Will Go Out To-day.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Dec. 15.—According to a striker who reached here from Topeka to-day an order for a sympathetic strike of the trainmen on the Santa Fé system will be issued at 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon by the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen unless the officials of that road in the meantime settle their differences with the telegraphers now out. This action, it is said, was decided upon at Topeka at a secret meeting of officials of the Order of Railway Telegraphers, Order of Railway Trainmen, and Order of Railway Conductors.

TOPEKA, Kan., Dec. 15.—President Dolphin of the Order of Railway Trainmen, when shown the dispatch from Kansas City late this afternoon saying that the trainmen on the Santa Fé system would strike in sympathy by 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon unless the company should arbitrate its differences with the operators, said it was a "pipe dream." He said the trainmen had indorsed the action taken by the strikers, but further than this nothing had been done.

ACCIDENT TO THE CUFIC.

White Star Liner Loses Propeller—Being Towed to Queenstown.

HOLYHEAD, Wales, Dec. 15.—The British steamer Bohemian, Capt. McCallum, from Boston Dec. 5 for Liverpool, reported this afternoon having spoken the White Star liner Cufic, Capt. Caven, from Liverpool Dec. 4 for New York, with her propeller lost. The Cufic was ninety-eight miles from the Fastnet, in tow of the British steamer Throstlegarth, making for Queenstown.

QUEENSTOWN, Dec. 15.—The Cufic has passed Kinsale in tow. She signaled that she had lost her propeller. Tugs have gone to her assistance.

BELATED KAISER WILHELM II.

Steamer Scheduled to Sail for Mediterranean Yesterday Arrived Last Night.

The belated North German Lloyd liner Kaiser Wilhelm II., which was scheduled to sail from this port for the Mediterranean yesterday, arrived early last night and anchored off Stapleton. Rough weather, in which gales predominated, from the Azores to port was responsible for the delay.

Among the passengers were C. H. W. Buck, Prof. John W. Burgess, Dr. G. H. Cochran, H. L. Crawford, A. M. Davis, L. S. Gillette, Col. Jacob L. Greene, Dr. W. P. Porter, J. C. Rowell, Carl Seiffert, D. S. Watson, J. H. Whitehouse, C. Frederick Burchardt, and P. H. Spaulding.

SIX DAYS' RACE ENDED

ONLY THREE PAIRS FINISH

Madison Square Garden Packed with Enthusiastic Crowds Who Cheer the Riders—Kaser's Money Held.

Teams.	Won.	Miles.	Laps.
Elkes and McFarland	$1,500	2,628	7
Pierce and McEachern	1,000	2,628	7
Simar and Gougoltz	750	2,628	6
Kaser and Ryser	500	2,586	4
Fischer and Frederick	350	2,532	0
Waller and Stinson	250	2,308	1
Babcock and Aronson	150	1,506	1

Record, 142 hours, 2,733 miles and 4 laps, held by Miller and Waller. Elkes and McFarland, therefore, were 104 miles and 7 laps behind the record.

America, first, represented by Harry Elkes and Floyd McFarland; Canada, second, represented by Burns Pierce and Archie McEachern; France, third, represented by Caesar Simar and Jean Gougoltz, and Germany, fourth, represented by Karl Kaser and Fritz Ryser. In that manner the leaders finished the six-day bicycle race at 10:05 o'clock last night, in the Madison Square Garden, which thus assumed a strong international tone. There were no sensational features, and the closing hour was not marked by any dazzling efforts on the part of the Frenchmen to regain the lap they lost early in the week. The three teams, for only six riders stuck to their weary journey to the finish, wheeled around the track at an easy pace, evidently content with their positions.

Waller quit the race early in the morning and his partner, Stinson, left with him. They had the sixth place secure without further work. At 4 o'clock, in the afternoon Fischer and Frederick withdrew, and at 7 o'clock the two Germans, Kaser and Ryser, quit. The three leading teams, with frequent changes, continued the slim bicycle procession. Even during the last hour they rode slowly, only registering 15 miles and 1 lap, one of the slowest hourly records of the entire race.

When the pistol sounded for the last five minutes there was a quickening in the line. Elkes, who had been riding for the better part of the hour, gave way to McFarland, and the latter kept the lead, followed by Pierce and Gougoltz. Pierce made a grand effort for two laps to shoot ahead of McFarland, but it was no use, and amid a pandemonium of yells, whistles, waving of hats and banners, McFarland passed the finishing line about 4 feet in advance of Pierce, who was about 6 feet ahead of Gougoltz.

On the main floor people stood on benches, tables, chairs, and the railing to see the finish. Two women fainted in the crush, and there were many falls from broken tables, but no serious injuries resulted. Huge floral offerings were presented to the victors, and each team, waving the flag of his country, then rode around the ring separately.

While the finish was closer in respect to the positions of the winners than last year, the race wound up over 100 miles behind the record established by Miller and Waller, and from a spectacular standpoint it was less interesting to watch. A year ago seven teams kept constantly whirling around the track, and Miller and Waller won by a clean lap.

So far as the success of the six-day race is concerned, different observers will give different opinions. Financially, in which the management is chiefly concerned, it has been far from a failure, for the profits over and above the prize money and all expenses, have been variously estimated from $20,000 to $35,000. The price of admission was advanced to $1 last night, but that did not deter the enthusiasts from packing the Garden to its utmost capacity. Not a seat could be found at any price by 9 o'clock, and the rear of the galleries were black with rows of standing men.

ARONSON STILL DISABLED.

On the other hand, the three teams that contributed the bulk of the sport and excitement after the noon hour were a lamentable falling off from the fourteen teams that started so blithely five minutes after midnight on Monday morning. The race has been characterized by more casualties than any previous six-day bicycle race held in this city. Three of the riders, Bleecker Turville, and Aronson, have been subjects for hospital treatment. The latter is the only one who has not yet recovered from his injuries, and he is liable to remain for several days in the New York Hospital, suffering from a contusion of the spine. Turville limped into the Garden last night on a heavy cane, having left Bellevue Hospital during the day. He occupied a box during the evening.

A close inspection of the men was not an edifying spectacle, either. Every man had been liberally dosed with stimulating drugs, Gougoltz and Simar favoring frequent sips of champagne. Their faces were lifeless, the muscles drawn and pinched, and eyes badly bloodshot. Even those who were suffering from bronchical trouble to a greater or less extent, due to the smoky atmosphere and dust in the Garden.

Fischer and Frederick quit the race at 4 o'clock with the score of 2,532 miles to their credit. In their last hour they wheeled 23 miles, one of the best records of the day. With Waller and Stinson out, 200 miles behind, as neither of the latter had been on the track since a little after midnight, Fischer and Frederick were sure of sixth place, and the $250 that it was worth. They celebrated their retirement from the track by drinking a big bottle of champagne with Penn, the champion wrestler.

Frederick, who had been considered almost worn out, furnished a sensation early in the morning by making a tremendous spurt, and after fast riding for two miles, he gained a lap. The absence of Fischer removed the funny man from the track, for he has done more clownish acts than any other racer, winding up his series by appearing in an enormous black wig which nearly covered up his entire face, early in the morning.

The crowd was thrown into a mild fit of consternation at 8:30 o'clock last evening when Elkes fell from his wheel after rounding one of the steep turns. He slackened his speed too much and tumbled down the inclined track. Gougoltz and McEachern, the only other ones riding then, made a spurt, but Elkes was soon back, none the worse except a bad discoloration of his white shirt with the American eagle and United States shield embroidered gayly on the back. He sustained no loss in distance.

Gougoltz and Simar were irritable all day long, and after their failure to make a lap in the morning they were at swords' points with each other until the finish. The attempt to regain the lost lap occurred at 6:30 o'clock in the morning, and gave the sleepy spectators a decided eye-opener. Simar, by a magnificent spurt, managed to get a lead of one-half a lap. McFarland, Pierce, Kaser, and Fischer were riding, and their relays were quickly brought up. Gougoltz relieved Simar and increased the lead, actually completing the lap, but as Simar came to relieve him the latter failed to pass his wheel when the change took place, and by the rules this lost the nearly earned lap. Gougoltz blamed Simar, and the men were in bad humor for the rest of the day. Gougoltz fell in the afternoon, due to one of his tires being punctured, and brought McFarland down with him. Neither was hurt and no laps were lost.

Attachment Against Kaser.

A feature of the six-day bicycle race that did not appear for spectacular interest occurred immediately after the contest finished. Papers in an attachment suit for $749 in favor of the R. H. Wolff Bicycle Company were served upon Karl Kaser, the German, who, with Ryser, got fourth place and a $500 prize. At the same time papers attaching the money were served upon the managers of the race, James C. Kennedy and "Pat" Powers. A representative from the law firm of Hornblower, Byrne, Miller & Potter served the papers. It resulted in a temporary withholding of the money from Kaser, and a few days will be given the latter to answer. It is claimed that the money is due the R. H. Wolff Company for bicycles sent to Kaser while he was agent for the firm in Switzerland in 1898. Kaser, who looked perfectly well after the race, affected to know nothing of the matter when questioned, and his trainer said that he was acting for him in the matter, but declined to say more.

STATE PROTECTION OF GAME.

Father and Son Will Have to Answer for Having Dead Mongolian Pheasants in Their Possession.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWBURG, Dec. 15.—Game Protector Willett Kidd of this city has been instructed by State Game Protector J. Warren Pond to institute proceedings against Joseph W. Wickham and his son, Frank Wickham, of New Hampton, Orange County, for violation of the game laws. Wickham, Sr., is charged with having in his possession four dead Mongolian ring-necked pheasants, while Frank is charged with shooting one of the birds which, according to law, are protected until 1905.

Mr. Wickham is alleged to have purchased in a New York market two cocks and two hen birds and brought them up to a taxidermist, to mount for him. Frank Wickham is said to have shot his bird on Snake Hill, near Denton, on or about Nov. 12, and the matter leaked out after he had taken his bird down to the taxidermist to be stuffed. It was through his bird that his father's birds were discovered. The punishment is $85 for each bird, which includes $25 for each one taken, and $60 additional as a penalty.

Josiah Conklin, who also killed a pheasant, has settled his case by paying the fine and costs, about $95.

Less than two years ago C. W. Chapin, the owner of the park situated in the central part of Sullivan County, liberated 250 ringed neck or Mongolian pheasants for the purpose of stocking the country. Mr. Chapin first secured a few pairs from the Pacific slope. These he confined and secured an average of forty eggs from each female bird. The eggs were then set under hens and about 4,000 young pheasants were hatched. They are adapted to our severe climate and very prolific. It was through Mr. Chapin the long limit protection was accorded.

NEW ORLEANS SEWERAGE BONDS

Bankers Form a Pool and Bid 104.619 for Four Per Cents.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, La., Dec. 15.—Bids for the purchase of the New Orleans sewerage and drainage bond issue were opened today. The amount of issue depends upon the rate of interest at which the bonds are disposed of. If the bonds had been accepted at 3 per cent., $16,000,000 would have been issued. If at 4 per cent., $12,000,000.

A pool, composed of five New Orleans banks, the New York Security and Trust Company, and Edward C. Jones & Co. offered to take $12,000,000 at 104.619 premium, to bear 4 per cent.; Ladenburg, Thalmann & Co. $5,000,000 at 4 per cent., at 103.05; the Canal Bank, $1,500,000 at 3½ per cent., at par. There were a number of small bids similar to the Canal Bank's bid. The offer of the pool will probably be accepted Monday.

Disappointment is expressed over the bids, as it was thought that the bonds would be sold on a 3½ per cent. interest basis, in which event the city would realize $14,000,000 from the sale.

MAINE'S BIG GAME SEASON.

Closes with a Record of 3,113 Deer and 138 Moose Killed.

Special to The New York Times.

BANGOR, Dec. 15.—The big game season in Maine closed to-day, and the record shows that there have been shipped through Bangor from the great game region north and east of the city 3,113 deer, and 138 moose, which is a decrease of 331 deer and 1 moose from the season of 1899.

This has been the best season, with the exception of 1899, on record. The falling off in the kill is attributed to various causes. In the first place, there have been fewer hunters, owing to the Presidential campaign, then the weather conditions were for the most part unfavorable, and only 150 fawns were killed, as compared with last season, when 500 were taken through Bangor in one month.

The season has been prolific of shooting accidents. On Oct. 18 W. L. Pond of Torrington, Conn., was mistaken by his brother-in-law for a deer while hunting at Namhakanta Lake, and shot and instantly killed. Oct. 21 at Patten, Harry Hillicker of Lowell, Mass., was accidentally shot and killed by his companion, Joseph Hubert of Augusta, Me. Oct. 26 Harry Knight of Brownville was shot and seriously wounded at Schoodic Lake, his companion, John Trimmons, mistaking him for a deer. Nov. 20, at Chester, W. E. Wilcox of Lincoln Centre missed a deer and the bullet inflicted a fatal wound on Fred Grant of Eddington. Dec. 6 A. G. Sturtevant of Foxcroft was found dead in the woods, supposed to have been killed by a stray bullet.

Rear-End Collision at Earl's Station.

GENEVA, N. Y., Dec. 15.—A rear-end collision occurred this morning between two freight trains on the Pennsylvania Division of the Central Hudson at Earl's Station, six miles south of this city. A train was standing awaiting orders. A flagman went back to warn an approaching train. He was too late, and the rear train, pulled by two engines, crashed into the caboose of the first train, eleven cars of which were derailed. The five cars between the two engines of the rear train were derailed. The first engine was badly damaged, and the caboose of the first train was demolished. The engineer and fireman of the first engine of the rear train jumped, as did a brakeman.

Mob Disperses After Making Terms.

JACKSON, Miss., Dec. 15.—At Westville this afternoon a daring attempt was made to lynch Charles Haverson, a young white man confined in the jail under sentence of death for murdering a prominent merchant named Ammons several months ago. The mob was composed of nearly a thousand people. The Sheriff and citizens made impassioned appeals for the life of Haverson, and the mob finally agreed to disperse on condition that if the Supreme Court should grant a new trial and a change of venue the people would be given notice when Haverson was to be taken from the county.

Two Hurt by an Exploding Range.

SING SING, N. Y., Dec. 15—William J. Underhill and Harry Kling attempted to make a fire in the range in Underhill's house, on Lafayette Avenue, about 10 o'clock to-night. The water back exploded, and both men were badly injured. All the brick work about the range was blown out and every window in the house destroyed. Underhill was badly cut and bruised about the face and body, and Kling was cut about the face and head and his leg broken.

Coeducation for Negroes.

JACKSON, Miss., Dec. 15.—The Board of Trustees of the Alcorn Agricultural and Mechanical College, an institution supported by the State for the education of negroes, to-day decided to admit negro girls to the college. This is the first attempt that has been made in Mississippi to give a practical education to females of the race. A fifteen-thousand-dollar dormitory is to be erected for their accommodation.

CHARLES C. BEAMAN DEAD

Partner in Law Firm of Evarts, Choate & Beaman.

Taught School for Three Years After Graduation—Wrote a Treatise on the Alabama Claims.

Charles Cotesworth Beaman, who had been for more than twenty years a law partner of United States Ambassador Joseph H. Choate in the firm of Evarts, Choate & Beaman, died of heart trouble last night at his home, 11 East Forty-fourth Street. He had been ill since Wednesday last. Up to the time he died, however, which was just after 9 o'clock, his sickness was not thought incurable.

Maine was Mr. Beaman's native State. He was born in Houlton on May 7, 1840, the son of a Congregational minister. Entering Harvard College in 1857, he was graduated four years later, after which he taught school in Massachusetts for three years.

He then entered the Harvard Law School, which he left after two years to become the private secretary of Charles Sumner and at the same time a clerk of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

His practice of the law began in 1867, when he went into the office of Dickerson & Evarts, of which Edward N. Dickerson and William M. Evarts were the members.

Seven years after that time he married the daughter of Mr. Evarts, becoming soon thereafter a member of the law firm of Evarts, Southmayd & Choate. This concern was succeeded by the firm of Evarts, Choate & Beaman.

While in Washington with Mr. Sumner, Mr. Beaman made a careful study of the Alabama claims, and he published a treatise called "The National and Private Alabama Claims, and Their Final and Amicable Settlement."

In 1872 President Grant appointed him Solicitor for the United States before the Geneva Tribunal. Later he was Examiner of Claims in the Department of State.

On Oct. 7, 1898, Mr. Beaman was nominated for a Justiceship in the Supreme Court of this State by the fusion convention that sprung out of the allied movement against Tammany Hall in that year.

He was a member of various clubs of the city, among them the Union, University, Union League, Century, Metropolitan, Down Town, Players, Republican, Riding, and Harvard Graduates.

The family that survives him consists of his widow, his three daughters, and one son, William Evarts Beaman. The daughters are Mrs. Mary Holmes, wife of Edward Jackson Holmes of Boston, and Misses Helen and Margaret Beaman. William S. Beaman, lawyer, of 99 Cedar Street, is his brother.

No arrangements for the funeral have been made as yet.

DEATH OF MRS. BRICE.

Passed Away on the Second Anniversary of Her Husband's Demise.

Mrs. Catherine Olivia Melly Brice, widow of Calvin S. Brice, died at 1:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon at her home, 693 Fifth Avenue, her husband having died just two years before to the day.

The cause of Mrs. Brice's death was Bright's disease, with which she had been afflicted for a long time. Last Winter she passed in California, endeavoring to regain her health, and her last two Summers were spent in the Adirondacks. Between the seasons she had lived here since her husband's death.

Mrs. Brice was born in Mansfield, Ohio, fifty-nine years ago. Her father was Lucius Melly, by whom she was sent, while still in her teens, to the Western University at Oxford, Ohio, the family having meanwhile moved to Lima, Ohio. She was graduated with honor, and in after years gave to the Oxford institution many large gifts, one of them being $50,000. She was then made a Trustee of the university.

For a few years after she left college Mrs. Brice taught school, the most part of her work in that direction being in Terre Haute, Ind. It was while there that she was married, in 1890, to the late United States Senator. When her husband became a Senator, in 1890, his family came into social prominence, having been widely known both here and in the West, however, before that time. While in Washington they occupied the Corcoran house, in which Senator Depew now lives. In Newport, their home was the villa called Beaulieu, built by William Waldorf Astor. Both of these establishments were given up after Senator Brice's death.

Mrs. Brice was as well known for her interest in charitable enterprises as for her social position, and there are many benevolent institutions in this city and elsewhere that have benefited by her generosity.

She is survived by five children. They are Capt. Stewart M. Brice, now in the City Council; Capt. W. Kirkpatrick Brice, John Francis Brice, and the Misses Helen and Catherine Brice. John Francis is at present a student in the Harvard Law School.

The funeral will take place to-morrow morning at the family home, on Fifth Avenue, and the burial will be in Lima, Ohio, where Senator Brice was interred.

Suicide of a Butler.

Augustus Jansen committed suicide sometime yesterday in his room in the Putnam House, 371 Fourth Avenue, by cutting his throat. The suicide was not discovered until shortly before 6 o'clock. Jansen went to the hotel Friday night. His body was discovered by the hotel clerk. The police say the man was a cab driver, but he was known to the hotel people as a waiter or butler. He stopped occasionally at the hotel, always taking the cheapest room in the house. A number of letters found in his pockets highly recommended him as a butler.

John Dozle was killed, and the four other men, names unknown, were badly hurt, two probably fatally. A trestle gave way under the train's weight.

WU-TING-FANG DINES AT THE LOTOS CLUB

TRIBUTES TO HIS ATTITUDE

His Reference to the Great Crisis and His Gratitude to America and Americans.

The Chinese Minister, Wu Ting Fang, was the guest of honor at a dinner at the Lotos Club last evening, and several hundred members of the club gathered to welcome him.

The club rooms had been decorated with special reference to the occasion. The walls were almost covered with holly and mistletoe. The guests' table was placed beneath the arch that connected the dining rooms. From a network of green the yellow banner of the Chinese Empire was suspended, its lower folds sweeping the red, white, and blue banner that hung beside it. Candles shed their light under yellow shades, and the menus were encased in yellow covers, adorned with a black dragon. The page within bore in a panel a portrait of the Chinese Minister.

Beside the portrait was the following inscription in another panel:

"Dinner in honor of Wu Ting Fang, His Imperial Chinese Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, Spain, and Peru, by the Lotus Club, New York, Dec. 15, 1900."

The Minister sat at the centre of the long guest table. He wore a sky-blue robe, with garnet overdress. On his right sat Andrew Carnegie, Frank R. Lawrence, the President of the club, was on his right. Others at the guest table were Chou-Tsz-Chi, Chinese Vice Consul in New York; Lock Wing of the Chinese Legation, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Rear Admiral Barker, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, Wayne McVeagh, Dr. Felix Adler, Charles R. Flint, Dr. W. W. Walker, and Almon Goodwin.

While the dining was going on Minister Wu added his signature to the cards for the guests. The fees were served in miniature mandarin caps like the one worn by the guest of honor throughout the dinner.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

President Lawrence, in introducing the Minister said:

"If we were perfectly educated, we should to-night address our guest in his own language a compliment which he undoubtedly would extend to us if our positions were reversed, and if we were visiting him in his native country.

"The name of China has of late been very prominently before the world; and in connection with China and its problems, scarcely any name has been more prominent, and no name has been more favorably before mankind, than the name of the very distinguished gentleman whom we have the honor to entertain this evening.

"The people of this and other modern countries, vaunting their civilization, have long been accustomed to send persons to China and elsewhere who feel endowed with a mission to teach. But if they would give attention sufficiently to the subject and abandon the idea that their civilization is the only civilization, they would find, upon a very moderate study, that from China and its people Europe and America have a very great deal to learn.

"The problems which affect the relations of that country with the rest of the world are too serious for discussion here. But surely it would be impossible to find a man better qualified to assist in their solution than the gentleman in whose honor we assemble.

"Was ever a man confronted by difficulties greater than those which have surrounded the Chinese Minister to this country during the present year? And did ever any man prove himself more capable of dealing with them?

"It required the civilization of many centuries to produce a diplomat so accomplished.

"The Chinese Minister has done much to conquer our people, not by force of arms, but by a very forceful and agreeable personality, by taking part in things in which we like to excel, by contributing delightfully to our magazines, and by addressing assemblies of our people upon such occasions as that of the opening of the Art Gallery presented to the City of Pittsburg by our friend and fellow-member, Mr. Carnegie.

"Perhaps, as time goes on, we shall know more about China, and China will know more about America. And if all the nations are to learn each from the other and are each to adopt from the others whatever may be best, the country of our guest has, so far as we know, produced no man more capable of contributing toward a better understanding than his Excellency, Wu-Ting-Fang."

THE MINISTER'S REPLY.

During the course of President Lawrence's speech, Minister Wu was industriously taking notes on a tablet which lay in front of him, and when he was finally announced amid great applause and the diners rose to drink his health, the Minister bowed right and left with a low salaam as the applause continued. His address also was punctuated with applause and laughter.

"I am deeply sensible," said the Minister, "of the honor done me to-night in the shape of this splendid banquet, and I am grateful for the cordial manner in which I have been received and for the kind words spoken by your Chairman. I rejoiced to hear the cheers with which you greeted this toast, not only because it was a compliment to me, but because I was convinced that the cheers showed your sentiments of good will to my country. As long as I live I will never forget this memorable occasion.

"I was surprised when I received the invitation, but when I heard the name of the club I could do nothing but accept, as it seemed to me a connecting link between me and this club. Of all the plants in China the Lotos is the one we most appreciate on account of its purity. (Laughter and applause.)

"I asked a gentleman sitting next to me why you had chosen this name for your club, and he told me that here is where gentlemen come for rest and recreation; so, naming it the Lotos Club, I think you have chosen an appropriate title. As I said, in China we appreciate the lotos, not only because we eat it, but if it is put in water the mud does not stick to it, but it remains as pure and fresh as ever. (Laughter.)

"For this reason we Chinese call the lotos the superior among plants, and in China we call the best men, the most studied men, lotos, and associations are formed under this name. So I accepted the invitation because I wanted to be in the company of the superior men of the United States." (Cries of "Good! Good!" and "You ought to have been an Irishman!")

Mr. Wu then sketched the crisis of last Summer, and told of the sleepless nights it had caused him. He said that he did but his duty to his country and his countrymen, and that in this everybody was excited and ready to believe the slightest rumor that came from China, he was proud to have been in a position to urge them not to be hasty, and that they had believed him when he said that authentic news would be received.

"When I was fortunate enough to get the first authentic news from Peking from Minister Conger [great applause] and lay it before the State Department," said Mr. Wu, "it gratified me that, although the people of Europe thought it was a forgery, the people and the press and the officials of this great country believed it was true. I was sorry to see that the people and the press of Europe believed that the news was a fabrication, and that the Chinese could not tell the truth.

"From my boyhood I have learned in the classics of Confucius that in dealing with others our words should be sincere. I can conscientiously say that I have always acted up to that injunction. (Applause.)

"It is to be regretted that the gentlemen who are sent abroad as Ministers are sent for the purpose of lying for their countries. This might be true in two or three cases, but I firmly believe that diplomatists are honestly, for while a falsehood may be useful for the time the truth will sooner or later come out, and then there will be trouble all around. I believe thoroughly that honesty is the best policy.

THE DIPLOMATIST'S ATTITUDE.

"I may compare a diplomatist playing the cause of his country before a foreign nation to the lawyer at the bar laying the cause of his client before the Court. It will not do to deceive the Court and the jury.

"No respectable lawyer would stoop to this. [Laughter.] I believe that the lawyers are all honest. I would be the last one to say anything against a profession to which I have the honor to belong. So I say that diplomatists ought to be honest and straightforward.

"Without a just tribunal, it is true, the best lawyer may lose his case, but it was my honor and privilege to plead the cause of my country before a just tribunal. To the straightforwardness of your Government, headed by your wise President and Secretary of State, is due what has been accomplished.

"Theirs is the credit, not mine. [Applause.] To the people of the country is the credit also due, for I understand that they indorsed the action of the Government and its wise and humane policy almost unanimously.

"In our classics we have a saying that the people should be made to follow without asking reasons. This is inapplicable to your people because on every question they are intelligently informed, and I have found them pre-eminently lovers of fair play. [Great applause.]

"This, gentlemen, is a wonderful Nation. Last week at the centennial in Washington I heard Senator Daniel say that ancient history had no precedent, and modern history no parallel, for the United States of America. This is a grand sentiment and a true one. [Great applause.] You have no ancient history, but you have been making history. It starts with Washington and has been enriched by Lincoln and Grant, and that of the present day embellished by the names and deeds of my friends, Miles and Dewey, and last but not least by William McKinley. [Loud and long cheering.]

"But we foreign diplomatists do not understand your politics. At least, I do not. Speaking for myself, I must say that I have never been able to master the intricacies of '16 to 1' or the 'full dinner pail.' These things are ton deep for my dull understanding. But what I understand is that no matter what party may happen to be in the White House, the glory of the Stars and Stripes will not in any event be allowed to grow dim. [Great applause.] As long as you have at the head of your Government such men as William McKinley, you will command the respect of all the nations of the world.

"In concluding, I want to quote another sentiment of Senator Daniel. He expressed the hope that Washington would one day be the capital of a Universal Republic. I think I have fathomed his deep meaning. It is this, that the position and just policy of your Nation will be recognized and prevail among all the different nations and the City of Washington be the centre and seat of universal peace, justice, and truth. [Great cheering.] When that day comes, and I hope it will not be far distant, the superior men of this country, led by the members of this club, will be those to bring about the happy state of affairs. Gentlemen, I think you for your honor to me and to my country."

After remarking that Mr. Wu had come nearer than any man to fathoming the objects of the Lotos Club, President Lawrence introduced Lieut. Gen. Miles. Gen. Miles, after paying a high compliment to the guest of the evening, said he had given at least a new idea in regard to the lotos flower when he spoke of placing a stalk of it in water, and from the results of which it increased.

"In this country," said Gen. Miles, "we call that watering the stock, but until the present I never knew that the Lotos Club was the author of that plan."

Gen. Miles told of his friendship for Mr. Wu, and how the Chinese Minister had labored to keep alive the hospitable relations between this country and his own. He told of the difficulty of the Minister's position at a time when a mistake might have been fatal. Then he paid a glowing tribute to the valor of the American soldier in the Far East, who he said had stood as a wall against plunder and rapine.

Rear Admiral Barker, who was the next speaker, said that the very presence of the guest of the evening in the face of recent events not only showed the regard in which he was held, but the regard held for his country. He said that he had once heard a clergyman say that he wanted no better proof of the beauty of Chinese character than the fact that "Honor thy father and thy mother" was one of its most deeply grafted principles.

"I believe in Christianity," said the Rear Admiral, "but I do not believe that we today are living up to the teachings of Christ. You know that it was Christ who said: 'Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth.' Who are the meek?" he asked, and from all parts of the room came the cry, "Here we are."

"Meekness," said Rear Admiral Barker, "I have found to be one of the great characteristics of the Mongolian race. I have seen it all over the world wherever these people are. Always patient, long suffering, and industrious. It has frequently come to my mind that the time may come in fulfillment of this prophecy when this great race may overrun the earth and take our places. Patiently they thrive and expand, and it may be that peacefully they will conquer."

President Lawrence said that every speaker came near to defining the characteristics of the Lotos Club. He then introduced Dr. Felix Adler as the next speaker.

Dr. Adler said that he had made it a rule not to accept invitations for Saturday night, but in this regard he was like the Yale professor, who, having made a similar resolve and broken it, explained the breach by saying that the invitation had been a great temptation, and that the only thing he was unable to successfully resist was temptation. Dr. Adler said that in this instance he must confess to the same weakness.

DR. ADLER APPLAUDED.

"Gen. Miles has referred to a problem, and we are facing it within a few weeks of the twentieth century," said Dr. Adler. "What is that problem? It is that of extending the ethics between man and man, and making that same code applicable between nation and nation. Here is a country 4,000 years old, and, in spite of the stationary character of its civilization, the tree is laden with fruit.

"A country fabulously rich, so much so that a recent author has said that in a space 230 miles long and 30 miles wide there is enough coal and iron to supply the world for 200 years. A country fabulously rich, truthful, frugal. The problem is how to keep away the hand of the greedy, the cormorant ready to pounce upon this land and its wealth, and how to teach the world the respect for this great nation. [Great applause led by Mr. Wu.]

"I take heart in the wise policy of our own nation, and in the fact that China has an Emperor who is in full sympathy with progress, and it is my hope that this great ruler's hands may be strengthened in his work of determining the destinies of his country and of his people.

"In these days when so little is thought of individualism the work of this grand man, our guest, is a testimony to the strength of manhood and personality. It is right to send missionaries abroad and to offer to the world our science and our religion, but not to force it on them; but it is also right for China to send to us this grand example of her civilization.

Wayne MacVeagh was next called upon. He said that he was utterly irresponsible for what he said after he sat down to dinner and he was glad of it. He said that Minister Wu would never receive a more genuinely American compliment than that which he received as the guest of the genuinely American club. The club, he said, had always stood for the merit of the individual member.

"Of course," said Mr. MacVeagh, "men get into the club who really ought not to get in. I was struck with astonishment to see Andrew Carnegie here, and yet this club does not disdain poverty. But nobody is perfect in his calling, and I even once listened to a severe criticism of Gen. Miles in which the critic said that Miles had urged his horse over the Confederate breastworks and engaged in a hand-to-hand conflict with the enemy, a thing which, the critic said no General had a right to do.

"I trust that I may be pardoned a serious word even in this presence. We are confronted with a conflict of two diverse civilizations, and the heart of the country and the world has been moved and pained by the excesses which have happened in that country which his Excellency represents. Any nation, large or small, has a right to say 'We don't want your teachers or your merchants or your missionaries.'

"Any nation has a right to remain isolated and have that isolation respected. I don't believe it is right to kill people in an effort to make them accept either our teachings or our merchandise, but when a nation says she will accept another's merchants or missionaries then she must be held responsible for their safety. We have not treated the Chinese well here. It is one of the blots on our civilization that we have not, but that is nevertheless no excuse for her to treat us badly.

"The first news of the safety of our Minister came from our guest. I was in Europe at the time, and when all Europe insisted that this news was false, I told them it was true, knowing too well the character of Wu-Ting-Fang to believe otherwise. Now that the safety of the Ministers has been assured what a Christian can mean by a punitive expedition I cannot see.

"The stories of plunder and the details of rapine make me almost ashamed of my religion. No nation has a right to do what Europe is doing to-day. I believe that China has suffered infinitely more at the hands of Christian nations than we have suffered at her hands."

President Lawrence announced that one of the rules of the Lotos Club was that no man was so poor or so unfortunate that when attacked he might not be heard in his own defense. He then called on Andrew Carnegie.

ADDRESS OF MR. CARNEGIE.

Mr. Carnegie said of Mr. MacVeagh that as he was a Philadelphian he did not wonder at his being unable to grasp the situation, which would explain the reason of his (Carnegie's) membership in the club.

"This is as near heaven," said Mr. Carnegie, "as we can get on earth, and it has been said that it is not easy for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. But I am not here as a rich man, but as a poor author. When the committee had been told that I was the author of several books they said, 'Oh, is that the fellow. Well, he is poor enough as an author,' and so I was elected by a unanimous vote."

Mr. Carnegie paid a marked tribute of respect to Minister Wu, who, he said, had done as great a work for his country as Lincoln had done for the United States. He said that he had grave doubts of the advantage of a paid propaganda sustained by guns and ships.

That, he said, was not Christ's way. The way to go as the friend of the Chinaman, to tell him if he was dihturbed in mind how peace had been found by others, but not to force that peace upon him at the point of the musket. That was not the way, he said, to spread peace and gaad will on earth.

"I agree," said Mr. Carnegie, "with Harrison and Cleveland in their ideas of Americanism. America to-day occupies a pre-eminent position. She stands between China and the robbers of Europe and her mission is to bring about the reign of peace."

Charles R. Flint, Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, and Job Hedges also made addresses. Minister Wu later was introduced to many of the club members, and initiated into the mysteries of the club crypt.

CAPTIVE HAWK SET FREE.

Perched on a Tree of Broadway's Graveyard He Ignores the Assaults of His Enemies.

On one of the bare branches of a large tree in the old graveyard around St. Paul's Chapel a huge chicken hawk roosted yesterday afternoon and philosophized on the peculiarities of mankind. Away off in the outskirts of Trenton one of these, his enemy, had caught him and placed him in a cage in spite of his fierce struggles. He had then been sent on a long journey in a dark compartment with a lot of low-bred birds and other disagreeable animals. On his arrival in this strange city he had been placed in a window, where he was stared at by the passers in the street. Then another hawk was placed in his cage, in whom he recognized an old rival, but with whom he soon became friends.

For a week they lived in the same cage, longing for their freedom, watching the sparrows in the trees of the old churchyard, and waiting the opportunity to escape. All this time he and his companion suffered the tortures of Tantalus, for above them, beneath them, around them, yet completely out of their reach piped a hundred fat, young chicks that were being raised for the market. Then the other hawk died, and the proprietor had wonder of wonders, opened his cage, bidding him to seek the woods.

"I was afraid he would die, too,' said the man, 'and he was a lot of trouble; so I let him go."

The hawk had flown up to the old tree and settled on a branch in his favorite attitude. Over in the corner of the Park the sparrows whom his appearance had frightened were excitedly chirping and fluttering. On the street stood a crowd of boys, men, and women. The boys threw stones at him, and one of the girls mistook him for a cockatoo. This, however, did not bother the hawk. He sat there and enjoyed the keen air of the winter unmindful of the crowd or the sparrows, and wondered at his regained freedom and deliberated whether to fly. Then, as the sun was dropping behind the tall buildings he rose with a great rush of his wings and sailed majestically away over the roofs and chimneys toward the west.

BOSTON BRIDE MISSING.

Woman Last Seen with Her Also Disappears.

BOSTON, Dec. 15.—The police of this city and a number of private detectives are searching for Sophie Huykli Maloof, an eighteen-year-old Syrian girl, who was to have been married at noon to-day. Her trousseau, which cost $275, although paid for, is at the store where purchased. The police traced her to a Syrian café, from which she departed for home yesterday afternoon, according to the story of Naszar, the proprietor.

Her prospective husband, Joseph Mailoof, then asked for assistance of private detectives. To-day they learned that Mrs. Naszar, wife of the restaurant proprietor, was in company with the Maloof girl all the afternoon visiting stores and making purchases. Mrs. Naszar was very affectionate toward the girl, publicly embracing her from time to time.

When the police went to the Syrian café to interrogate Naszar and his wife, both were missing, and it was stated that they left in a hurry for New York.

COLUMBIA'S BIG BUDGET.

The budget of the expenses of Columbia University, which has been prepared for the year ending June 1, 1901, shows that it will cost more than $1,000,000 to run the university during that period. For educational and administrative purposes the Trustees have appropriated $940,837; for interest on bonds and other debts, $111,181.80, and for interest and expenses on the William's Bridge, Loubat, and other university property, $52,245.

It is estimated that some other small expenses, together with the above amounts will bring the total for the year up to $1,200,000. As this exceeds the expense of any previous year by nearly $400,000, it is seriously feared that the annual deficit will be far in advance of previous years.

The deficits of each year are usually covered by individual gifts and by the guarantee fund of the university. The Treasurer of the university in his last statement reported that the trust funo for this year is $1,270,080.75—an advance of $115,830.91 over the fund in 1899.

HE RENOUNCES CITIZENSHIP.

Frenchman Who Says He Has Suffered "Spoliations" Since Naturalization Sends Back His Papers.

Clerk John H. Loos of the Naturalization Bureau of the Supreme Court, has received a letter from a Frenchman renouncing his American citizenship, to which Mr. Loos finds himself unable to reply. The Frenchman, whose name is Jean Pierre Guinet, has affixed his certificate of citizenship to his letter, but Mr. Loos says he has no power to cancel it, and does not know how Guinet can obtain relief. The letter is as follows:

156 West Fourteenth Street,
New York City, Dec. 8, 1900.

To the Bureau of Naturalization, New York City Hall:

Gentlemen: I, undersigned, respectfully return that paper of naturalization.

From the time that I received it, instead of getting the protection like a citizen, I have received only insults, persecutions, torturres, and spoliations. I beg to inform you that for receiving such treatments I would prefer never to be your citizen, and beg you, gentlemen, give the due information and never consider me any more like such. Let me told you, gentlemen, that I came in your country a free and honest man and that I want to remain free and respected. I am, gentlemen, of yours the very respectful. J. P. GUINET.

Guinet was naturalized by Justice Truax on Oct. 5, 1899. He stated that he had lived in New York for seven years, and in the United States for seven years; that he could read and write the English language; that he had read the Constitution of the United States, and that he considered he would be a good and worthy citizen.

"Do you know the form of government we have here?" Guinet was asked by Justice Truax.

"Yes," was the reply; "the same as in France."

Clerk Loos says the only way Guinet can renounce his citizenship is by committing some act of treason to the United States, or by getting himself into prison on some charge for which conviction will deprive him of his rights as a citizen.

At the house at 156 West Fourteenth Street it was said last night that no such man as Guinet lived there, nor was he known to any one in the place. The name does not appear in the Directory.

INVENTOR SENT TO BELLEVUE.

Mrs. Hasbrouck Says Her Husband Is Insane—He Threatens an Exposure.

John C. Hasbrouck, inventor of the Hasbrouck Fire Extinguisher, threatens to expose in the Yorkville Court this morning a scheme whereby he is to be committed to the insane asylum so, he alleges, his wife can secure his money.

A call was received at Bellevue Hospital last evening for an ambulance to go to Hasbrouck's house, 114 East Twenty-fifth Street. Dr. Sullivan of the hospital, who was sent, found in a room on the third floor Hasbrouck, his wife, one son, and Dr. Fitch, the Bellevue Hospital insanity expert. Dr. Sullivan says he was told to take Hasbrouck to the hospital, as he was insane. He refused to do so without the proper commitment papers, and returned to the hospital.

Later a call was received from the East Twenty-second Street Police Station for an ambulance, and Dr. Pulsifer was sent to the station house. There he found Hasbrouck with his wife and Dr. Fitch in a carriage outside. Dr. Pulsifer was told that Hasbrouck was insane, and that his wife had made a charge of insanity against him. Accompanied by Patrolmen Hallahan and Healy, Dr. Fitch and Mrs. Hasbrouck, the inventor was taken to the hospital.

Before being taken to the insane pavilion, Hasbrouck said that his wife was conniving to put him away so as to get his money. He said that two years ago his wife had "palmed" him off on a sanitarium near Stamford, Conn., but that he had escaped and had since lived with his wife and two sons in the Twenty-fifth Street house.

Hasbrouck was at one time a broker, in addition to being the inventor of the fire extinguisher bearing his name.

Mrs. Hasbrouck said that her husband had caused her a great deal of trouble. He had been drinking, she said, and she and her two sons and the other occupants in the house were afraid of him.

WOMEN TO HAVE A CLUBHOUSE.

College Alumnae to Unite as the Women's University Club.

A number of representative college women met yesterday afternoon in the rooms of the Woman's University Club, 23 West Forty-fourth Street, to consider the subject of consolidation in some form, with the specific object of obtaining and maintaining a clubhouse. Barnard, Vassar, Wellesley, Smith, Cornell, Radcliffe, and Michigan University organizations were among those represented. This matter has been under consideration for over a year, and the different college organizations have been asked to obtain the consensus of opinion in regard to this step from their members.

After considerable discussion, the following resolution was adopted:

That an association shall be formed of college alumnae possessing a degree, to which all women college graduates shall be eligible, and whose especial object shall be the possession and operation of a clubhouse in New York City.

Motions to admit undergraduates were tabled. Several of the individual college clubs have active members who are undergraduates. A committee, consisting of the President, Secretary, and one other member from each organization, was appointed to draw up a constitution and by-laws. The new organization, it is expected, will be called the Woman's University Club, and will be modeled along the lines of the Boston College Club. There are some 700 women represented in the organizations interested. Mrs. Truman J. Backus of Brooklyn presided yesterday. Mrs. William Henry Hayes, Acting President of the University Club, received authority to call the meetings of the committee appointed.

PRESIDENT EXPELLED FOR $1.

Court Orders Mrs. Keller's Reinstatement in the Damen Chor.

Mrs. Minna Keller, wife of Conrad Joseph Keller of 1,095 Union Avenue, was expelled on Dec. 28, 1899, from the New Yorker Saengerbunde, a German singing society, or rather, from the Damen Chor der New Yorker Saengerbunde, which is the ladies' branch of the organization, although no charges were made against her. Mrs. Keller was at the time the President of the Damen Chor, which decided to celebrate the jubilee of the Saengerbunde on Nov. 15, 1899, by presenting the male members of the association with a silk flag. Mrs. Keller was authorized to collect subscriptions.

The flag was purchased and presented, but whispers went around among the Damen Chor that Mrs. Keller had failed to account for part of the subscriptions received by her. She demanded an investigation, which proved that she had accounted for the dollar, but while absent from a meeting on Dec. 28, 1899, she was expelled. Through her lawyer, August Wagener, she brought suit for reinstatement, and Justice Freedman, in the Supreme Court, yesterday, after hearing testimony, directed that she be restored to all the rights and privileges of membership.

Mrs. Keller now threatens a suit for damages against the members of the Damen Chor who expelled her.

WOMAN HELD FOR SHOOTING.

Sadie Dean's Story of How Gellar Was Shot Denied by Other Women Witnesses.

In the West Side Police Court yesterday morning Sadie Dean of 600 Tenth Avenue was charged with having shot Joseph Gellar, a cabinet maker, in her apartments last Friday night. After the shooting the detectives arrested, besides the Dean woman, Julia Lang, forty years old, and Mary Lee, forty-five years old, of 218 West One Hundred and Thirty-third Street, and William Tompkins, who, with his wife, lives on the same floor with the Dean woman in the Tenth Avenue house.

Gellar is in the Roosevelt Hospital in a precarious condition. Contradictory stories were told of the affair by the various parties. The Dean woman said she took a revolver from the closet to show to the Lee and Lang women, who were visiting her, and that it was discharged and Gellar was hit. The other two women denied that they were in the room when the shot was fired. Tompkins said he heard the shot from his own apartments, and went to the scene of the shooting. He then called the police.

The Dean woman was held without bail for examination to-morrow, and the other two women and Tompkins were sent to the House of Detention.

WEISBECKER WAS DISTURBED.

His Employes Were Vaccinated and Some Started a Rumor of a Smallpox Epidemic.

Vaccination received a setback in Harlem yesterday, and the Board of Health will have difficulty in re-converting at least one man to recognize the virtues of the virus. The man is Charles Weisbecker, a wholesale butcher in the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street Market, where he employs several hundred men to handle meats.

Some time ago Mr. Weisbecker thought it would be proper to have all his men vaccinated. Therefore he sent to the Board of Health for virus and doctors, and pretty soon the left arms of all his men began to swell and Mr. Weisbecker was happy.

He remained happy up to yesterday when it dawned on him that his trade had been falling off steadily, and that he failed to do practically any business. He was much puzzled, when shortly after noon one of his customers rang him up on the telephone.

"How are the smallpox patients getting on?" the customer asked.

"Smallpox? We have no smallpox here," Mr. Weisbecker answered, much puzzled.

Then came other telephone calls, fast and furious, until it was discovered that some one had circulated a story of a smallpox epidemic in Weisbecker's market, and all because the employes had been vaccinated. When Mr. Weisbecker returned to his home, at 127 Seventh Avenue, he found a bundle of letters and postals from friends who were anxiously inquiring whether he had been stricken by the dread disease or whether he had allowed any one with smallpox to handle his meats. When seen last night, Mr. Weisbecker said:

"Well, of all experiences, this is the worst."

DINNER TO MR. ROBLEE.

Tammany Men Honor the President of the Seneca Club.

Milton Roblee, the proprietor of the Hotel Bartholdi, was the guest of honor at a banquet in his hotel last night given by members of the Seneca Club and members of the Tammany organization of the Twenty-fifth District. Mr. Roblee is President of the Seneca Club. The banquet room was decorated with National flags, as well as with those of other countries, and the tables were beautified by clusters of American Beauty roses. Sousa's Band furnished the music during the evening. The dinner itself was an elaborate one, and handsome souvenirs were given.

Charles E. White acted as Master of Ceremonies at the banquet and Robert Hobart Davis acted as toastmaster. The speeches were all complimentary to Mr. Roblee. Augustus T. Docharty made the principal address, and said in part:

"Milton Roblee has attracted to himself a large circle of friends and acquaintances during his residence in this city of the past ten years, and as proprietor of the Hotel Bartholdi he has made for himself a name and reputation which have become a household word to the people of New York. Why? Because of his geniality, his well-known kindness and good-fellowship and the method he has always adopted in dealing with those with whom business brought him in contact. Thus it is that his name and fame have become well known here."

Three hothouses in North Bergen, N. J., were destroyed by fire early yesterday morning. Three other hothouses were saved by Mrs. Heins, who kept them deluged with a large garden hose while her husband ran half a mile to summon the only fire company in the township to the scene.

She kept at the work even after the firemen arrived, and was warmly complimented on the success of her exertions as a fire fighter.

MURDERER CLEVERLY CAUGHT.

Engineer Recognized Him on Railway Tracks and Invited Him to Ride.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J., Dec. 15.—Lee Boyler, colored, who is wanted in Salem County for the murder of Oscar Hendrickson at Woodstown, was captured in South Amboy last evening.

He was walking along the tracks of the Camden and Amboy Railroad when recognized by Engineer Elias Stratton. The engine was stopped and the negro invited to ride. He was taken into the yard at South Amboy, and, under the pretense of getting him warm, he was kept in a flag shanty while Chief of Police Minnick was notified. Boyler denied that he was the man wanted.

WIFE GONE; FARMHAND, TOO.

Duncan Says She Forged His Name to Checks—She Leaves Three Children.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 15.—John Duncan of Rhode Hall, near this city, caused the insertion in a local newspaper to-day of a notice stating that his wife having left him he warned all persons against harboring her at his expense. Duncan is a wealthy farmer of Rhode Hall, and his wife left him mysteriously Thursday night. The fact that a German farm hand also disappeared at the same time has given rise to a report that there has been an elopement.

Mrs. Duncan went to the residence of a colored family on the night of her disappearance with her baby girl, aged about one year, and told them that she was going to spend the night with a sick neighbor. She asked them to care for the baby. That was the last seen of her around Rhode Hall.

Her husband has learned that she used his name to get considerable goods in this city, Cranbury, and other places. It is also alleged that she forged checks in his name on the National Bank of Cranbury. She leaves behind, besides the baby mentioned, two boys, aged seven and eight years.

John G. Rolston Hangs Himself.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 15.—John G. Rolston, who is in the employ of the New York Biscuit Company as a salesman, committed suicide this morning at his home, 56 Cleveland Street, Orange, by hanging himself to a beam in the cellar. Rolston had been in ill-health and it is believed was mentally unbalanced because of business troubles. Rolston was fifty-two years old. For many years he was Superintendent of the First Methodist Episcopal Church Sunday School in New York. A widow and two daughters survive him.

HOUSE ACTS ON WAR TAX REDUCTION BILL

Passes It After Taking Off the Tax on Express Receipts.

ALSO PASSES PENSION BILL

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—The House to-day passed the War Revenue Reduction bill. The opposition sought to recommit the bill with instructions to report back a measure reducing the revenue at least $70,000,000, and including a provision for an income tax so drawn as to escape an adverse decision of the Supreme Court. The motion failed, 131 to 155. Thereupon the bill was passed without the concurrence of the minority, who refrained from voting.

The amendment placed in the bill yesterday to tax express receipts was defeated on a yea-and-nay vote, 125 to 139.

The Pension Appropriation bill, carrying $145,145,230, was passed in exactly thirteen minutes.

When the debate opened, Mr. Underwood (Dem., Ala.,) moved to reduce the amount of property exempt under the Inheritance Tax from $10,000 to $5,000. Mr. Payne, (Rep., N. Y.,) in charge of the bill, spoke in opposition, saying that, personally, he thought the Inheritance Tax should not have gone into the original act, as the States generally, and especially the Eastern States, levied heavy inheritance taxes. But if it was to remain, he was opposed to reducing the exemption to $5,000. The amendment was lost, 15 to 83.

Mr. Powers (Rep., Vt.,) then offered an amendment providing that the inheritance tax should not be levied on the estates of persons who died prior to June 13, 1898. He said the amendment should be adopted to clear up and to prevent false construction of the language of the present law. The amendment was adopted, 84 to 54.

Mr. Newlands (Silver, Nev.,) offered a modification of the amendment he presented yesterday to tax industrial corporations whose gross receipts exceeded $500,000 one-twentieth of 1 per cent. upon such receipts, and requiring such corporations to file complete statements as to their receipts, taxes, wages paid, &c. His purpose, he said, was to reach the great aggregations of wealth.

"The real purpose of this amendment is to apply an inquisition to corporations, is it not?" demanded Mr. Pearce, (Rep., Mo.)

"It's purpose," replied Mr. Newlands, "is both to raise revenue and to secure information upon which to base regulative legislation."

"Has the gentleman changed his mind since he signed the report saying the pending bill would raise too much revenue?" asked Mr. Payne.

"My objection to the pending bill," responded Mr. Newlands, "is twofold. It raises too much revenue, and it does not raise it from the proper sources."

Mr. Grosvenor (Rep., Ohio,) opposed the amendment. He expressed the hope that the House would not attempt to make inroads upon industrial corporations without investigation by the proper committee of the House.

"If you will frame an amendment that will reach every corporation or every income I will vote for it," observed Mr. Newlands, amid applause.

Mr. Grosvenor said he might favor an income tax if it were Constitutional, but he said it was futile to discuss an income tax after the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Sulzer (Dem., N. Y.,) supported the Newlands amendment. He was in favor of compelling the big corporations to bear their share of tax burdens. He favored a graduated corporation tax. The amendment was lost, 75 to 105.

Mr. Fitzgerald (Dem., Mass.,) thereupon moved to strike out the tax of 10 cents per pound on tea. He characterized the tax as unjust and extortionate, and appealed to the members to support the amendment in the interest of the "breakfast table" and the "five o'clock tea."

Mr. Payne opposed the amendment. The tax on tea, he said, raised about $9,000,000 of revenue, and for ten years had been asked for by the tea trade. Some of the importers who had a large supply of tea in bond, he said, were naturally in favor of repealing the tea tax. This amendment was also defeated—55 to 76.

Mr. Levy (Dem., N. Y.,) offered as a substitute for the bill a bill fixing the tax on beer at $1.50 per barrel, 40 cents upon tobacco and snuff, and repealing all the other sections of the War Revenue act. The substitute was defeated, without division.

After the bill had been reported to the House, Mr. Payne demanded a separate vote on the Smith amendment placing a tax of 1 cent on each express package. On a yea-and-nay vote the House reversed its action of yesterday and defeated the Smith express receipt tax amendment—125 to 139.

Mr. Richardson, (Dem., Tenn.,) on behalf of the minority, then moved to recommit the bill, with instructions "to forthwith report a bill reducing the revenues under the War Revenue act at least the sum of $70,000,000, the taxes remaining to be apportioned so as to more equally and justly distribute the taxes and to remove them from the articles most nearly the necessaries of life, and which enter most generally into consumption." He asked that the committee also include in the bill "a provision so framed as to accomplish the just ends of an income tax, and yet escape the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases growing out of the Wilson tariff law."

Mr. Hopkins (Rep., Ill.,) observed facetiously that the motion was subject to a point of order. "It instructs the committee to report back an income tax provision that will circumvent the decision of the Supreme Court," said he. "Plainly, that is requiring the committee to perform an impossibility."

The motion to recommit was lost, 131 to 155. The bill was then passed, the Democrats refraining from voting.

It was agreed that Monday, after suspension business was out of the way, be devoted to the consideration of private pension bills. On motion of Mr. Barney (Rep., Wis.,) the House then went into Committee of the Whole and took up the consideration of the Pension Appropriation bill. Mr. Barney stated that there was no new legislation in the bill. It was an exact copy of the bill for the current year, both as to language and amount. It carried $145,145,230.

The bill was read through and passed without debate or amendment in exactly thirteen minutes.

REAPPORTIONMENT QUESTION.

Tentative Vote in Committee Favors Retention of the Present Membership.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—One reason has appeared why the Census Committee of the House is not likely to be as prompt in getting through a reapportionment of Congressional membership as the Census Committee of the Fifty-first Congress. The committee is divided, a vote to-day showing one majority in favor of the plan of Chairman Hopkins to continue the present membership of 357 in the next apportionment. On the proposition to revise representation strictly in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution, by depriving States of members when they deprive part of their population of the right to vote, the committee was to-day found to be unanimously in favor of passing that mandate over and fixing representation on the basis of population.

The votes that were taken to-day are referred to by members of the committee as having been merely tentative. If the division is unaffected by criticism upon members from their own districts, it is possible the bill introduced by Mr. Hopkins and embodying the plan to continue the representation at 357, will be approved. A caucus will be held before the bill is taken up, and predictions are heard that the bill will then be changed so as to provide an increase of no more than thirty members, which will bring it somewhere between 357 and 387. With 387 members no State will lose anything. The programme talked of this afternoon was to have the caucus Monday night and to bring in the bill agreed upon on Tuesday. With the Southern representation problem dropped, it is hoped to get prompt action.

Should the caucus of the committee refuse to change the representation, it is not improbable that the House may take the matter into its own hands. According to Mr. Hopkins's plan the seven States of Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Nebraska, Ohio, South Carolina, and Virginia will each lose one member. These States are likely to make common cause against a bill that will cut down their representation. Together they command 72 votes. If the Democrats stand solidly against the scheme to keep the present representation, their votes, added to those of Republicans from these seven States, will bring the minority up to a majority. Then New York and Pennsylvania expect to get at least three and two additional members respectively, and may prefer the extension of membership. Mr. Hopkins's plan gives New York only one additional member and none at all to Pennsylvania.

The objection of the Census Committee to increasing membership is that the House is now too large and the present membership crowded. This was Mr. Reed's opinion, and it led him to prepare a design for packing the members more closely together without desks in order that they could better hear and be heard and to constrain them to attend to business other than correspondence while in their places.

HAWAII'S DELEGATE SWORN IN.

Explains to the House Matters Arising Out of His Two Marriages.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Hawaii's delegate, Robert W. Wilcox, was sworn in in the House to-day, notwithstanding the petition filed by citizens of Hawaii opposing his admission. On being asked about the objection raised to him on the ground of his marriages, he said that his first marriage, to an Italian, had been annulled by the Pope before his second marriage to a Hawaiian Princess, and that he had been informed that the Italian Court had also annulled the marriage at that time. After the second marriage he had discovered that the courts had not acted in the divorce case at that time, but the action was taken afterward.

With reference to his being a royalist, he declared that, although he had been a supporter of the Queen, he was now an American citizen, as were other native Hawaiians who had formerly supported the Queen, and that they were satisfied with the new state of things, realizing, as proved at the recent election, that as American citizens they enjoyed greater privileges than under the former conditions.

LOOK FOR ARMY APPOINTMENTS.

Many Congressmen Ask for Berths for Their Constituents.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—There does not appear to be much doubt that the Army Reorganization bill will soon become law. Secretary Root should have found proof of this in the character of the visitors at the White House to-day. Many Senators and Representatives called upon the President to bespeak for constituents anxious to serve their country the promise of appointment to the new army when organized. To all these applications the President answered that he would give them consideration.

The applicants were not exclusively Republicans. Among those who admitted the nature of their errand to the White House were Senator Pettus and Gen. Shelley and Representatives Underwood and Latimer of the Democrats. All applicants are informed that in reorganizing the army it will be the effort to retain as many as possible of the volunteer officers now on duty in the Philippines and to promote wherever possible from the ranks rather than to send out new officers without field experience. After that, vacancies will be filled from War Department lists of civilian applicants.

NEW ROOMS IN THE CAPITOL.

Congressional Committees Will Have Better Quarters.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Occupying the space formerly occupied by the Congressional Library in the Capitol, there are now twenty-eight light, airy, attractive rooms of various sizes, but none very small, fourteen of which are assigned to the use of the Senate and fourteen to the use of the House of Representatives. The location of these rooms, equidistant between the extreme wings of the building, and their newness and freshness, make them very inviting to committees now assigned to rooms in the basement on the terraces.

This morning the Senate Committee on Rules undertook to carry out a distribution of the fourteen rooms assigned to that body, but the pressure proved to be so great that it was decided to take more time to consider the applications. Priority of application may have something to do with success in trying for good positions in the Senate, but seniority of service overweighs all other considerations, and will tend to give the preference for these rooms to senior Senators.

The House distribution has not yet been made. As several of the House committees are now doubled up in small rooms and ill-lighted and ventilated rooms at that, some of them never penetrated by the light of day, the occupation of these new rooms will be a great relief to many members of the House.

Report on Torpedo Boat Stockton.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—The report of the naval board appointed to conduct the official trial of the torpedo boat Stockton has reached the Navy Department. It will be remembered that the Stockton failed by a slight margin to make her speed requirement. The board reports the seagoing qualities of the Stockton to be good, the vibration under high speed comparatively slight, and the workings of machinery, engines, and manoeuvring gear satisfactory. It attributes the first failure to an accident, and says the vessel has a mean speed of 25.79 knots.

TALL POKER YARN TOLD

Sixty-Thousand-Dollar Game at the Waldorf, It Is Said.

Players Reported to be John W. Gates, Col. Drake, Henry Well, and Jacob Field—Big Bets on "Four Flush" Hands.

Sporting circles last night were listening with interest to the latest tall tale of a limitless poker game, played Friday night in the Waldorf-Astoria, in which, it is said, more than $60,000 changed hands.

It is said that the parties to this ten-hour sitting were John W. Gates of the American Steel and Wire Company, Col. John Drake, the well-known turfman; Henry Well, whose wife recently secured a divorce, and Jacob Field, also well known in sporting circles.

Messrs. Gates and Drake left the Waldorf yesterday, and Messrs. Well and Field could not be seen to confirm the story of the game. By those who claim to know, it is asserted confidently that the game was played in the rooms of one of the players; that it was a "bluffers' battle royal," and that when the chips and checks were cashed John W. Gates was $60,000 to the good.

Proprietor Boldt and Manager Thomas knew nothing of any such skyscraping game. Oscar, the omniscient, shrugged his shoulders and muttered, "I no know?" Detective West settled the matter to his own satisfaction by declaring positively there hadn't been even a bellboy game of penny ante in the house in two months.

Yet along the Rialto the wonderful hands that were held were being talked of, and one bluffing encounter is related with much relish. It goes about like this: "Mr. Field was dealing for a jack pot.

The pot had been sweetened until enough lay in the centre of the table to stock a small racing stable. Mr. Drake opened with a pair. Everybody staid. The gentleman on Mr. Drake's left took one card.

The next player took three. Mr. Gates took one. The opener made a big bet. The next man raised it a few hundred. The next player saw the raise. Mr. Gates raised again, and back and forth went the raises until the dealer and one other of the party dropped out.

Mr. Gates and the player who took one card still raised each other. Each had apparently drawn for a straight or a fluah, and seemingly each had filled. Finally when a neat pile of checks had topped off the chips, Mr. Gates's vis-à-vis called.

"Four flush, queen high," Mr. Gates is said to have remarked, calmly, shoving his chair back.

"Mine's own jack high," returned the other dolefully.

TARRED THE WRONG MAN.

Colorado Vigilance Committee Makes a Serious Mistake.

WALSENBERG, Col., Dec. 15.—The Vigilance Committee at Pictou, the big Colorado Fuel and Iron Company coal camp, organized to ferret out the numerous robberies which have occurred lately, got hold of the wrong man Friday night and before they had found out their mistake they had him tarred and feathered, and in a condition bordering on insanity.

Friday night one of the committee saw a negro with a bundle under his arm. Chase was given, but the man escaped. Another of the committee ran across a negro closely resembling the first one. Despite his struggles and protestations of innocence they bound him and carried him over to a tar kettle that was still hot and had been used in tarring a roof. His clothes were torn from his back and a coating of tar administered, then some feathers were applied.

The man was Henry Burton, one of the most respectable in the camp and one that the company trusted implicitly. He was taken to a saloon and the committee proceeded to scrape off the tar as best they could. They took some skin off with it, and when they had finished, the man was almost crazed with agony. Then he was filled with liquor, some money placed in his pocket, and two men carried him home.

MIDSHIPMEN'S PROTEST OF '63.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Charles P. Greenough of Boston has given to the Navy Department a document which he bought at public auction some years ago, containing the signatures of the midshipmen of the Naval Academy in 1863. It is a petition addressed to the House Committee on Naval Affairs, protesting against bringing into the Navy a large number of volunteer officers.

The petition, which is in the handwriting of De Long, of Arctic fame, appears to have been signed by every midshipman then at the academy. Among them was Bradford now a Rear Admiral. The names of Chadwick, Folger, Goodrich, Dickens, Wilde, Davis, Train, and others who have since distinguished themselves in the service also appear. The department has sent this interesting paper to the Naval Academy to be preserved in the library there.

SUING A WATER COMPANY

Private Consumers in the Borough Charge the Officials of the Company with Extortion.

The Atlantic Trust Company, as trustee, through its attorneys, Alexander & Colby, has brought suit in the Supreme Court against the Crystal Water Company of Edgewater, Staten Island, and the Mercantile Trust Company, as trustee, to have foreclosed a mortgage which it holds against the water company for $743,000, together with the unpaid interest on the same, amounting to $44,580, one half of which was due on Jan. 1 last and the other half of which became due on June 1 last.

The Mercantile Trust Company is impleaded as a holder of a second mortgage on the property of $89,000, such claim being subordinate to the lien of the holder of the first mortgage, to foreclose which the action is brought.

According to the complaint, which was filed yesterday with the County Clerk of Richmond County by Bainbridge Colby and served on the counsel for the water company, Taylor & Seymour, the Crystal Water Company is engaged in the business of maintaining water works, pipes, mains, and other plants and fully authorized by law to hold property mortgaged by it to the plaintiff.

The water company on July 1, 1890, issued bonds to the amount of $1,000,000, payable in twenty years and bearing interest at 6 per cent. At the same time the company executed and delivered to the Atlantic Trust Company its mortgage or deed of trust, conveying to the latter all its rights, franchises, and privileges, lands and other property set forth in the mortgage.

On this mortgage the first default in the payment of interest was made on Jan. 1, 1900, when there became due $22,290, and another payment of a like amount became due on June 1, both being unpaid. The mortgage provided that should there be default in the payment of the interest for ninety days after it became due, then the whole of the outstanding bonds should, at the option of their holders, become due, and the lien created by the mortgage might be enforced for the whole debt.

In the prayer for relief filed by the plaintiff the court is asked to appoint at once a receiver for the company, subject to the order of the court. The usual injunction to restrain the defendant water company or its officers from interfering with the property is asked for.

Other legal actions growing out of the suit in foreclosure are to be taken in the near future to further conserve the interests of the plaintiff in the property in question. Alexander & Colby refused yesterday, however, to state what further actions were contemplated.

There has been more or less trouble in and about the water company lately following a reorganization of its Directorate. The company supplies the village of Edgewater, and a number of other villages in the northeastern part of Staten Island. Several weeks ago a vigorous protest was entered at a meeting of the Richmond Borough Board of Public Improvements against granting concessions to the water company. The citizens who made the protest declared that the company was using its power under the contract made with the old village Trustees to wring from private consumers all the money possible, that the officers were unfair, and that they treat the consumers with such insolence and flow of improper language that it is not safe for a woman to visit the office. The water company had asked permission to lay new and larger mains in the Serpentine Road on Gryme's Hill. Action was postponed.

As an instance that the company is making money and is in a position to pay its obligations, it is shown by the statements of consumers at the meeting that efforts had lately been made by the officers of the company to double the cost of water. Michael Brisk, a Stapleton business man, said that a meter had been put in his place, and that besides his rate had been raised from $30 to $60 per annum. It is said that instances of this management had their effect in bringing on a foreclosure action. Louis Rosenfeld is President of the company.

SMALL BID AT TAX SALE.

D. F. Keyes Agrees to Pay Taxes on Piece of Land for one Decillionth of an Inch of It.

ALBANY, Dec. 15.—The smallest bid ever received by the State at a tax sale was made to-day, when D. F. Keyes of Ononta put in a bid for one decillionth of a square inch in a piece of property in Richmond County. The manner of selling lands at a State tax sale is this:

When the land is put up for sale, the bidder offering to pay the tax for the smaller portion of the land gets a title to the land for which he agrees to assume the tax. In most cases the bidder simply agrees to pay the tax for the whole piece of land. If the land is particularly desirable, there is apt to be considerable competition and the amount of land is bid down.

The lowest bid ever received before to-day was for one octillionth of an acre to pay a tax of $154.38. To-day there was some lively bidding for a piece of land in Richmond County. Mr. L. Keyes was the owner of the property, and he wanted to bid it in to clear the title. He kept on bidding down until he got to his limit on decimals, and then his opponent went him one better, his son, D. F. Keyes, jumped into the breach and bid one decillionth of a square inch. His bid in plain English means that for one decillionth of a square inch of this property he will pay the taxes amounting to $60. Keyes got the property.

In the French system of numeration, commonly followed in the United States, a decillion is the eleventh power of a thousand. It is represented in Arabic numerals by the figure 1, followed by 33 ciphers. In English numerals a decillion is represented by 1, followed by 60 ciphers.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENTS.

Present Congress Will Not Consider Proposed Changes.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—The Senate and House Committees on Judiciary have reached an agreement to postpone consideration of the Ray bill, for the amendment of the bankruptcy law until next Congress. The bill was drawn on the recommendation of the National Association of Referees, the members of which were appointed under the terms of the bill. It provides remedies for defects in the law so far as they have come to the surface, but there are now bankruptcy matters before the United States Supreme Court, the decision of which may make necessary other amendments than those suggested.

Another reason for postponement is found in the fact that it is not generally believed there is sufficient time during the short session for the careful consideration demanded by a question so involved as the bankruptcy law.

CUBAN IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Figures Show that Bulk of Ieland's Trade Is with This Country.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—The Division of Insular Affairs, War Department, makes public to-day a statement of the trade of Cuba for the fiscal year ended June 30 last. Merchandise to the value of $71,681,187 was imported during the year, composed in the greater part of food products and manufactured articles. Of the total importations $34,347,008 worth came from the United States.

The importation from Porto Rico amounted to $1,611,337, and over $5,000,000 worth came from Central and South America. The total importation, including gold and silver, was $76,869,813. It is set forth that since the date of American occupation, July 17, 1898, up to the end of the last fiscal year, imports to the value of $113,846,603 have entered the ports of Cuba.

The value of exports of merchandise from Cuba during the last fiscal year, most of which were products of agriculture, is set down at $45,228,446. The total exportation of gold and silver amounted to $4,258,206.

The total exports from the island since it passed into the possession of the United States amounted to $81,894,823.

J. J. HILL DENIES REPORTS.

Says He Has Not Resigned Great Northern Presidency and Is Not in Any New Combination.

ST. PAUL, Dec. 15.—James J. Hill, President of the Great Northern Railway, to-day made the following statement in answer to the reported absorption of the Erie Road, the report of his resignation as President of the Great Northern, and the allegation that he will take up the work of organizing a trans-continental line, taking in the Erie as a connecting link:

"As to my resignation and the taking up of the work of the organization of a new trans-continental line, the story is nonsense. The fact is, a few friends have joined me in an investment in the Erie Road, which is good property and capable of being made into a paying investment, as has been done with the Baltimore and Ohio. So far as trying to organize a great combination of lines across the continent is concerned, there is absolutely nothing in it. Such an undertaking would be too great for any person to handle, and besides that, it is impracticable. The conditions are too diverse to warrant any such attempt. In the East and the West the business conditions are too far apart to put them under one management. Things must be taken as they exist. The whole proposition is nonsensical.

"As to my retiring from the Presidency of the Great Northern, I was re-elected to that position at the annual meeting of the road in October, and there is no likelihood of my getting out of it. I would be glad to be relieved of some of the burdens of the work, but do not see any immediate prospect of any changes looking to such an event. I went into the Erie as an investment, and not to increase any burdens. The road has for a long time been kicked about, but lies in a section that makes for tonnage, and it is to be improved in such manner as seems most likely to bring good returns on the investment and make it a permanently good paying property. But the whole story of a gigantic combination is the veriest rubbish."

WILL BUY MORE COAL MINES.

Philadelphian Says Morgan Interests Will Acquire Holdings of Coxe Brothers & Company.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 15.—The purchase by J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. of the Pennsylvania Coal Company in the interest of the Erie Railway is looked upon in anthracite circles in this city as but incidental and preliminary to a still greater and closer alliance between the anthracite interests. It is said that the next move of the Morgan interests will be to purchase the anthracite interests of Coxe Brothers & Co. in the Hazleton field, and that several offers for the property had already been made.

The tonnage of this firm, together with that of the Delaware, Susquehanna and Schuylkill Railroad, owned and controlled by it, is almost as large as that of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, its percentage of the tonnage allotment being 3.50, compared with 4 per cent for the Pennsylvania Coal Company. Having secured these two interests the most dangerous independent competitors in the anthracite coal trade would be removed. An authority on coal matters says:

"With the Morgan interest practically in control there could be an entire rearrangement of the present situation so far as the geographical distribution of anthracite is concerned. Instead of each anthracite carrier invading the territory of the others, flooding it with coal and dividing tonnage rates, each would confine its distribution within its legitimate territory, due consideration being given to its proportionate share of the entire territory.

"The Reading, for instance, instead of shipping large quantities of anthracite to the West, there to come in competition with other companies, would confine itself purely to its own territory, which embraces the country reached by its own lines and New England. In this manner the railroad would receive the entire freight tonnage receipts upon the company's output of coal, and at the same time would have the benefit of staple prices for its coal."

SHORT LINE TO TIDE WATER.

Combination Hopes to Make Quebec a Leading Port.

MINNEAPOLIS, Dec. 15.—The Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad is to become an important link in a vast transcontinental system of railways controlled by the Canadian Northern. McKenzie & Mann, contractors, who are financing the scheme, have mapped out a route which will shorten the distance to tidewater by more than 1,000 miles for all Northwestern freight destined to European markets. The McKenzie & Mann roads already connect Winnipeg and Port Arthur, and they expect to be operating trains between these points next September.

From a perfectly reliable source it was learned yesterday that the builders have made an alliance with the other capitalists in Ontario and Quebec who are in control of an air line from Parry Sound to Quebec, where one of the first Winter ports of the world will be established. The shortening of the line by about 800 miles is counted on to give Quebec an advantage over New York and other American ports.

Cascade Tunnel to be Opened To-day.

ST. PAUL, Dec. 15.—The famous new Cascade Tunnel of the Great Northern Railway will be open for traffic to-morrow, the first trains running through it on that day, and doing so regularly hereafter. The train which left Seattle to-day will be the first to pass through the tunnel, that which left this city yesterday being the first of the west-bound trains to do so. The new large 150-ton engines will be used in the tunnel for the present, burning coal which is almost entirely free from sulphur, and therefore well fitted for tunnel use. Later electricity will probably be used through the tunnel, but the plans have not yet been perfected.

AMERICAN BRIDGE IN INDIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 15.—The Gakteik Viaduct, built by the British Government in the Shan Hills of Burmah, India, as part of the railroad from Rangoon, Burmah, through Mandalay into China, which, as announced in an Associated Press dispatch, has been accepted by England, is the work of the Pennsylvania Steel Company of this city. The construction of the viaduct is regarded as a most remarkable engineering achievement.

The bridge spanning the Gakteik Gorge is 2,260 feet long and 320 feet high over the deepest part. The bridge is built entirely of steel. It has 16 supports of lattice steel work, 140 feet apart. The supports vary in height from 20 to 320 feet, and the base of the highest covers 135 feet on each side.

Altogether about 40,000 tons of steel were used. Shipments of the material were made during July, August, and September of last year. Three freight steamers were required to carry the steel. About forty American mechanics, the most skilled obtainable, went along to Burmah, more than three hundred natives being hired to aid in the construction of the bridge. Work was begun Jan. 30 of this year and completed in November. Bridge building companies of the world competed for the contract.

IS BUYING NO QUARRIES.

Senator Proctor Says of Reported Carrara Deal "Nothing in It."

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Senator Proctor of Vermont, who was this morning referred to in a dispatch from Rome as arranging for the purchase of the quarries of Carrara, Italy, for $10,000,000, protested with laughter to-day that there was "nothing in it."

"Oh, those fellows are trying to hold me up," he said, "and give the papers a chance to make fun of me. All there is to the matter," continued the Senator, who did not appear disposed to be very explicit in his discourse about the reported negotiations, "is that my attention was directed by some men over there to the fact that these quarries might be purchased. I sent word over to have a man look at them. I don't know any more about it."

CUBAN RAILWAY PROGRESS

Object of the New Line to Santiago—Anxiety of Cubans for Established Government.

Sir William Van Horne has been to Cuba in the interests of the New Jersey corporation known as the Cuba Company, which is now building a railroad through the eastern half of the island from Santa Clara to Santiago. When seen at the Manhattan Hotel last evening, Sir William said:

"Work on the railroad has been commenced, and the entire length of the line has been surveyed. The road will go from Santa Clara to Santingo, and later it may be extended to Baracoa. I expect that 335 miles of the road will be open for traffic in eighteen months. The object of the road is to connect Santiago with the western part of the island.

"The need of such a railroad has been felt for the past forty years. The people have asked for it repeatedly, but the authorities took no heed until now private enterprise has undertaken to build it. I regard its construction as the first step toward the development of the eastern part of the island.

"The conditions under which the company is building the road are unusual owing to the political circumstances. It possesses no privileges or rights now, for by the terms of the Foraker resolution all applications for public concessions of railroads, &c., must be referred to the United States military authorities. In consequence, we are proceeding on the basis of a private railroad doing business on its own ground. Of course, we understand that when the road is completed we could not open it for public traffic without the sanction of the authorities, but we trust that in eighteen months' time some settlement as to the future government of Cuba will have been reached, or, if not, that Congress will recognize the fact that the Foraker resolution is handicapping industrial enterprise in Cuba, and afford relief.

"The right of way has been cheerfully accorded to us for nothing by the owners of the property through which our line passes, and the reports that there is local hostility against the road are untrue. The interests behind the Cuba Company are nearly all in New York. No railroad is connected with the scheme, although railroad men as individuals are interested.

"We are utilizing native labor, but all our material and rolling stock will come from the United States. It is our intention, also, to import laborers from Spanish Galicia and the Canary Islands. They make excellent colonists, and they will be encouraged to settle on both sides of the railway.

"I travelled a good deal in Cuba, and I think it is the richest country I have ever seen. The time will surely come—that is, when yellow fever has been stamped out on the seaboard, as it has been already in the interior, when Cuba will be the Riviera of the United States. Wealthy Americans will build villas there by the hundreds and enjoy an ideal Winter residence.

"I do not think the idea of the Cuban generally accepted in the United States is quite the correct one. I have found him both energetic and intelligent. As to the poorer classes, they may look ragged and forlorn, but you may be sure they have more savings concealed among their rags than an American of the same class would have.

"There has been a distinct improvement in Cuban conditions in the island since the American occupation. I visited Havana, Santiago, Cienfuegos, San Luis, and other cities, and found them perfect models of cleanliness. The streets are kept far cleaner and the sanitary conditions are much better than in many American cities. No one who saw Santiago during the war would recognize the place now, so much is it improved. The natives understand that this is due to the American régime, and they appreciate it.

"The feeling of the Cubans toward the United States is hard to define. I talked with a large number of substantial Cuban business men, but it is difficult to know what their real sentiments are. They hardly know themselves. It may be defined as a kind of impatience, a longing to have a definite form of Government, to be either American or Cuban, in other words to 'know where they are at.' Of course, the solid business men distrust the firebrands. They say they have had enough of war; what they want is a long period of peace in order to develop their wonderfully rich country.

"I certainly think that the United States has every reason to feel gratified that it sent Gov. Gen. Wood to Cuba. Naturally he has stepped on the toes of some influential men there, but on the whole, he has done admirable work, and the Cubans themselves have recognized this."

ANOTHER EAST SIDE ROBBERY.

Mrs. Zagon Bound and Held in the Store While Companion Steals Diamonds.

A daring daylight robbery, the particulars of which have just come to light, was perpetrated at 11 o'clock last Tuesday morning, when the auction and jewelry store of Isidore Zagon, at 60½ Delancey Street, was robbed of diamonds valued at $400. The proprietor of the shop had gone away on business, leaving his mother, Mrs. Sarah Zagon, in charge.

Zagon had not been gone long when a young man entered and asked if the "Boss" was in. Mrs. Zagon replied that he was not, and the visitor then inquired if they repaired jewelry. The man was so obviously making a hasty examination of the premises that Mrs. Zagon became suspicious and told him to come around later, when her son was in. The man went out and joined two companions on the street, a short distance from the store. The three conferred together, and finally one of them took his stand near the street corner, while the other two entered the Zagon shop. The neighborhood is a thickly populated one and scores of people were passing to and fro.

Mrs. Zagon was again asked if the "Boss" was in. "No, no!" she exclaimed, now thoroughly frightened, and attempted to push the two men out of the door. One of them then seized her by the throat and forced her to the floor. He knelt on her chest and gripped her throat until she was almost strangled.

Meanwhile the other man opened the show window and took five diamond rings. The man looked further through the stock and apparently saw nothing else desirable. He signaled to his companion, who released Mrs. Zagon, and the two rejoined their companion on the street and all went down Allen Street.

A moment later Mrs. Zagon, with blood streaming from her mouth and nose, staggered from the store and ran down the street shouting "Thieves." A number of persons ran in the direction that the men had taken, but the robbers could not be found.

When Zagon returned and heard of the robbery, he reported it to the Eldridge Street Police Station. He was directed to Police Headquarters and detectives were put on the case, but thus far nothing has been accomplished.

$30,000 FIRE IN BROOKLYN.

Five-Story Building at Bedford Avenue and Fulton Street Destroyed.

A fire yesterday afternoon in the five-story brownstone building at the northeast corner of Fulton Street and Bedford Avenue, Brooklyn, owned and occupied by Henry Carson, a grocer, caused much excitement.

The fire started in the cellar of the building and is thought to have resulted from an overheated furnace. The ground floor was used as a grocery, and there was a large assembly hall and meeting rooms on the upper floors. The flames spread rapidly, but were kept in the building. The loss, said to be covered by insurance, was about $30,000.

Printing Plant Damaged by Fire.

Fire that originated early last evening in the steam printing plant of Lipschitz Brothers, on the fourth floor of the six-story building, at 170-178-180 Grand Street, caused damage to the amount of $5,000 to the firm named. The blaze was confined to the printing plant. Its origin is unknown, as there was no one in the shop after 5 o'clock.

CHICAGO'S VICE CRUSADE

POLICE CHIEF LEAVES TOWN

Goes to New Orleans Races While Grand Jury Is at Work—Democrats Face Defeat Next Spring.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—Alarmed by the attitude of the opposing elements, the city administration has at last made some attempt to remedy certain evil conditions of life as found here. No one has very much confidence in the good faith behind these efforts at reform, and it is plain to most people that no remedy will be had while the present influences are still in power. The connection between flagrant violators of the law and the city administration is quite patent to any one not affected with moral strabismus.

At the order of the Mayor women were forbidden to frequent certain down-town saloons which have become notorious through the robberies which have occurred there, and through being the scene of the downfall of many young persons. These places, many of them fitted up in flash style at great cost, have heretofore been furnished with music. They contain wine-rooms and private apartments where befuddled men are robbed by the harpies who frequent them. The saloons have been filled nightly with depraved characters of both sexes, who have made the theatre district a disgrace after nightfall. For about a week the women were unable to gain admittance to these resorts. Now, however, they are flocking back, but only "soft" drinks are served to them at present.

That these blots on the city's life have been permitted to exist without their paying some one for the privilege is too much for sophisticated belief. An evidence of their influence with the administration is to be found in the fact that one Police Captain who had been instrumental in trying to keep these resorts within the bounds of decency has been transferred to a district where his morals are more in keeping with those of the other inhabitants.

The scandal in which the Police Department has found itself involved, and in which the connection between certain high officials and a firm of loan sharks has been clearly established, to say nothing of the disgraceful exposure of the frauds perpetrated upon the Merit Board by would-be Lieutenants, was the subject of a stirring charge to the Grand Jury by Judge Gibbons, who indicated clearly, although he mentioned no names, that the jury might find its duty in indicting certain officials of the department. He referred to the "rampant" condition of crime here, and said that the officials guilty of allowing the existence of such a state of affairs should be punished.

His charge to the jury was almost coincident with the sudden and mysterious disappearance of Chief Kipley, who shortly after daybreak one day packed his grip and left the city for New Orleans, without informing his family, the Mayor, or his assistants where he was going. He is still there attending the races. It is positively asserted and as positively denied that he has resigned. Speculation as to his successor still goes on in spite of Mayor Harrison's firm assertion that Kipley is still Chief.

Kipley has long had as an enemy Robert E. Burke, the deus ex machina of the administration—the Oil inspector and political boss, whose word is law here as Croker's is in New York. Burke only permitted the appointment of Kipley as a favor to Harrison. He has waited for an opportunity to replace him with Luke P. Colleran, Chief of Detectives, a man who is not on speaking terms with his Chief, as, indeed, many of the inspectors are not. The disorganization of the force is nearly complete. There is insubordination and disrespect for duty in many instances, and one policeman has charged Kipley with extorting $200 in connection with a robbery here some months ago. The Merit Board is going to investigate this charge, and the State's Attorney promises to prosecute it if it is warranted by the evidence.

In addition to this there has appeared a detective who, it is said, acted as a go-between in the Baxter police investigation in 1899, and who says he will testify against Kipley before the board. He promises to produce evidence that he was employed to steer away witnesses who might give testimony adverse to Harrison and Kipley. He holds a number of receipts for money paid to witnesses who thus refused to take the stand and tell what they knew. The names of Harrison and Kipley both appear in the receipts. Judge Gibbons is at work on additional instructions to the Grand Jury, and State's Attorney Deneen promises to make use of all the material he has as soon as the Grand Jury concludes its work.

The city administration approaches the Spring election handicapped by all these things, and by two terms in which little good has been accomplished and much harm done. Not only will the Democratic bosses have to face the consequences of their four years' work, but they must meet the growing factional fight with the Hopkins wing of Democracy, and they must battle with the Republicans, stronger than they have been in more than six years.

The redistricting of the city by wards, a measure for which has passed the Council, will enable the Lorimer-Jamieson-Haney-Smyth combination to control twenty-five of the thirty-five yards under this scheme in any city or county convention. The greatest fear that they have at present is that Mayor Harrison will veto the ordinance. One curious effect of the redistricting is that many of the old bosses are now in new and strange wards.

Another heavy handicap with which the administration will enter the fight, and one which will tell severely against it with the taxpayers, is the fact that it will begin the new year with a deficit of no less than $3,000,000 to overcome. Reports from the Board of Election Commissioners are awaited with concern, for fear that another $500,000 may be added to the columns of debt. As a result of this bleak prospect, a cry for the most rigid economy has gone out to all the departments. The most liberal sum to be gathered from the tax levy does not place the city's share at more than $5,000,000. From this the deficit, whatever it may be, must be deducted.

This deplorable state of finances is the result of the extravagance of the Council in appropriating $7,000,000 nearly a year ago, in the expectation that it would come through the County Treasurer's office. Early in the Summer came the announcement from the Board of Review that there would be a horizontal cut of 30 per cent. The result of this was the dismissal of 300 employes of the city. Even this drastic measure failed to make up for the expenditures authorized under the budget.

A further result of this stringency will be that few if any public improvements will be undertaken during the coming year. Unless the Supreme Court reverses the decision of the lower tribunal in the bond case, there will be no available source for the bridge-building fund—to carry out sadly needed improvements. There is no doubt that the report of the Board of Election Commissioners will increase the deficiency at least $500,000. It is estimated that the City Controller will have to prune $1,000,000 from the listed expectations.

There is little doubt that the four big steamers now being built for the Counselman syndicate will take grain cargoes from Chicago to European ports on their initial trips. It is regarded even by those interested in the boats as an experiment, and if it is not successful the boats will be used in other lines of traffic. Outside of the question of time for the voyage is the important one for insurance on cargoes. The lake vessel owners who have sent their ships to the seaboard this Fall have paid an insurance of from 4½ to 5 per cent. on the single trip from Lake Erie to New York. Such high figures on grain will be considered as prohibitive as compared with the low rates from Atlantic seaboard points.

The State Pawners' Society, which runs the newly established Pawners' Bank, has, after a little more than a year's existence, found it necessary to increase its capital stock from $100,000 to $200,000. In this short time this is the second increase in stock. The capital is now four times its original figure. Notwithstanding the first increase, the society had to borrow $30,000 three months ago to meet the demand for loans. In his annual report President Farwell says:

"Considering the first year's results, the Directors have no hesitation in saying that the stock will no doubt earn 10 per cent., and that semi-annual dividends of 6 per cent., the maximum allowed by law, may safely be looked for." He also estimates that within a few years $500,000 capital will be needed. During the first year 17,161 loans were made on collateral of all kinds, of which 9,949 were redeemed. The renewed loans amounted to $140,576.25 and the outstanding loans amount to $117,214.50.

CRIMES OF A DAY IN CHICAGO.

Record Includes the Theft of $1,000 in the Post Office.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—Events of the past twenty-four hours show that the reign of crime has not been checked. William J. Calhoun, late of the National Inter-State Commerce Commission, was robbed of his overcoat in Judge Tuley's courtroom. A man reached through the cashier's window at the Post Office and got away with $1,000 in currency.

In sight of the Englewood Police Station Mrs. William H. Harnwright was robbed by two masked men.

For the third time in a month the flat of Dr. H. C. Mackey was robbed of money and jewelry.

Armed with revolvers and daggers, two well-dressed men entered the saloon of Myer Lewis, Seventeenth and State Streets, early last night and held the proprietor at bay behind the bar while they broke open the cash drawer and took $50.

Two burglars were found in the house of Mrs. M. Miller. They ran away, and were fired at by a policeman. Blood on the walk indicates that one was shot, but both escaped.

Mrs. Amelia Meyer, a handsome woman, was arrested as a shoplifter. A store detective says he caught her stealing gloves in her room over $2,000 worth of goods was found. She is a stranger, but wore specially made clothes in which to place her stealings. She tried three times to commit suicide.

Several highway robberies of minor importance were reported to the police.

TO SUCCEED 'CHOSEN FRIENDS.'

New Fraternity Will Reinsure Risks of the Defunct Order — Western "Treachery" Charged.

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 15.—Detailed plans for the Standard Fraternal Association, which it is intended shall reinsure the members of the Chosen Friends, so far as possible, were made public to-day by those who are at the head of the new organization, which is designed to be the successor of the defunct fraternity. A meeting will be held in this city next Tuesday, at which there will be present Louis A. Steber of St. Louis, Dr. C. A. Burhans of Cincinnati, Albert Rosengartner of Louisville, G. L. Smith of Chicago, W. G. Gibson, T. B. Linn, and Gilford A. Dietsch of this city.

At this meeting the plans already decided upon by the officers of the new order will be indorsed. All those called to the meeting have been prominent in the Chosen Friends, and will hold official capacities in the new order. The officers of the Standard Fraternal Association will be as follows:

Past Supreme President—Joseph Clark, Jr., New York; Supreme President—W. F. Gibson, Indianapolis, formerly of San Francisco; Supreme First Vice President—S. C. Wallis, San Francisco; Supreme Second Vice President—A. Rosengartner, Louisville, Ky.; Supreme Secretary—T. B. Linn, now Supreme Recorder, Chosen Friends, Indianapolis; Supreme Treasurer—L. A. Steber, St. Louis; Supreme Medical Examiner—Dr. C. A. Burhans, Cincinnati; Supreme Marshal—David Sanders, San Antonio, Texas; Supreme Warden—G. H. Pfersch, Hoboken, N. J.; Supreme Guard—P. H. O'Brien, New Haven, Conn.; Supreme Vidette—G. L. Smith, Chicago.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 15.—Nathan B. Kilimer, acting Supreme Treasurer of the order of Chosen Friends, whose office is in this city, said this afternoon that he believed the application for a receiver for the Chosen Friends in Indianapolis yesterday and the simultaneous announcement by the Supreme Recorder, T. B. Linn, that members of the order would be taken into a new Western fraternal order, to be nothing more than a deep laid plot to wreck the Chosen Friends and secure members for the new order.

"It's a fraud, an absolute Western fraud, just as I suspected when I first heard of it," declared Mr. Kilimer. "Although the order was in bad shape and had unpaid death claims of members who were killed in the Galveston storm to the amount of about $70,000, it had been agreed to solicit new members to meet the deficiency, and we had every reason to believe the order would have pulled through if it had not been for this Western treachery."

The published report to the effect that the late William B. Wilson, who was the Supreme Treasurer of the order, confessed that there was a shortage in his accounts, is received with incredulity by his friends in the office here. They say that if there was a shortage it could not reach anything like $34,000, the sum stated by Supreme Counsellor H. H. Morse yesterday, and they refuse to believe that the dead man used any of the money for his own purposes.

Miss Sadie Wilson, a daughter of the late Grand Treasurer, said to-day that about the middle of last August her father sent his books by express to Indianapolis for the purpose of having them audited. After a wait of five or six weeks the books were returned with a letter from the examining officials of the order saying that the books were found to be correct.

At the offices of the Sick Benefit Society and the Loan and Savings League it was said to-day that Mr. Wilson's accounts with those concerns were in good shape.

"DIPLOMA" DEALER PUNISHED.

Chicago "Doctor" Gets a Year in Prison and a $500 Fine.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—"Dr." James Armstrong, President at various times of the Metropolitan and Independent Medical Colleges, and the Illinois Health University, was to-day sentenced by Judge Kohlsaat to serve one year in Joliet and pay a fine of $500. Armstrong was found guilty of using United States mails to defraud.

Testimony adduced at the trial showed that Armstrong's institutions were devoted entirely to the selling of "diplomas." Blank "diplomas" were sent by the dozen to various places, including many foreign countries, and there disposed of.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Suggestions by C. C. SHAYNE.

From now until the holidays most men are too busy to "shop" in a vague search for an appropriate gift and many are forced to realize that our hearts are bigger than our purses at this particular time of year, when all regard it as a duty and a pleasure to remember in some substantial way those who are dear to us.

Few there are, however—and very few—who have not the time and means to gratify, to some extent, at least, the sentiment which possesses us and grows as the holidays approach. But the real perplexity of the question presents itself:—What shall it be? What article will be the most expressive of the sentiment, and, at the same time, come within the range of our purse strings?

MAN HUNT IN MAINE.

Officers Go After Pete Fountaine, a Notorious Old Poacher—To Bring Him in Dead or Alive.

Special to The New York Times.

BANGOR, Me., Dec. 15.—The most exciting man hunt that has been undertaken in Northern Maine since the United States Marshals went to storm the fortress of George Nadeau, away up the St. John River, is now in progress, Game Warden Herman Templeton and Guide Ben Woodward of Kineo having started for Baker Lake to capture "Old Pete" Fountaine, the king of all poachers. For forty years has "Old Pete" set the laws and the Wardens at defiance, and in that time every officer of any reputation has tried to bring him to Bangor for trial. Some have found his camp in the deep woods, but, somehow or other, when they got there the old man had disappeared.

Warden Templeton has always been at odds with "Old Pete," and last Summer something happened that stirred the Warden up to the effort of his life to capture the outlaw. While Templeton was cruising around in the neighborhood of Baker Lake one day a shot rang out and a bullet passed so close to his head as to take his cap off. He immediately paddled ashore and searched the woods for the man who had fired the shot, but in vain. Templeton suspects that the bullet came from "Old Pete's" rifle.

Late in November Warden Templeton applied to the State Game Commissioners for authority to go after "Pete" and bring him out, dead or alive. It is not known what reply the Commissioners made to this proposal, but it is certain that Templeton and Guide Woodward, armed and equipped for a long hunt, have gone north.

Capturing "Pete" Fountaine is looked upon as a rather dangerous job, but Templeton and Woodward are men afraid of nothing, and they can shoot as quickly and as straight as can "Old Pete." The outlaw has a camp near Baker Lake, and his line of traps extends for fifty miles north to the Allegash. He may be at home when the Wardens reach the lake, and he may be away tending his traps. Wherever he may be, the arrival of the officers will be made known to him at once by some of his numerous friends. The only way to get him will be to surprise him, and then, as the woodsmen say, "The old critter's likely to shoot."

Many are the offenses charged up against "Pete," including smuggling, and the result of the hunt for him is awaited with great interest and considerable apprehension.

RUN ON BANK ABOUT OVER.

About 1,000 Depositors Have Taken $450,000 from Harlem Institution.

Depositors in the Harlem Savings Bank continued to withdraw their accounts yesterday, but it was evident that the scare was practically over. At noon when the doors were closed there remained only a few persons in line. It did not seem to trouble them very much that they would be obliged to wait until Monday to obtain their money, and with the exception of one or two excitable women all left quietly, and when questioned as to their opinion of the bank, said that they had no doubt that it was perfectly safe, but that they would feel more easy with the money in their possession.

President Charles Tooker said that in his opinion the run was about over. As near as he could estimate about 1,000 depositors out of about 35,000 on the institution's books had withdrawn their accounts, which aggregated $450,000, of which $34,000 was taken out yesterday.

FIRST CATHEDRAL MARRIAGE.

At the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, at Morningside Heights, Miss Mary Goodrich Monell, daughter of the late John F. Monell, was united in marriage yesterday afternoon to Frederick S. Walt of this city by the Rev. John Marshall Chew, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Newburg.

The wedding is the first one held in the new cathedral, and took place in the crypt, before the Tiffany altar. By reason of serious illness in both families, a large wedding was given up. The bride was given away by J. N. Weed of Newburg, an old friend of the family. Edwin Tatham of this city acted as best man, and Miss Masters of Dobbs Ferry was the attendant of the bride. There were no ushers nor musical service.

A few intimate friends were present. The bride's step-mother, Mrs. Caroline E. Mcnell, now eighty-six years of age, was also present. Mrs. Monell was formerly the wife of Andrew Jackson Downing, the projector of Central Park. Mrs. Walt is well known in this city and at Fishkill Landing. The bridegroom is well known in legal and literary circles. He is a member of the Union League and Reform Clubs and the Bar Association, and for several years resided at the Union League Club. His office is at 10 Wall Street.

Business Man's Wife Found Dead.

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Dec. 15.—Mrs. Ferdinand B. Smith, wife of a well-known business man of this city, was found dead late this afternoon at Tailsome Hill, a suburb of this city. It is the opinion of the medical examiner that death resulted from an overdose of morphine. There are many punctures on the woman's arms, probably made by a hypodermic syringe. The body was removed to the Morgue, where it was identified this evening by Mr. Smith and his daughter.

BIG CHINESE ARMY APPROACHING PEKING

French Report 10,000 Men Advancing on the Imperial City.

BRITISH FOUND NO TREASURE

Col. Tullock's Expedition Was Ineffectual—A Dying Boxer's Prophecy.

PEKING, Dec. 15.—The French report the approach of the Chinese Imperial City of 10,000 men, Pao-ting-Foo, the French garrison, fifteen miles west, being attacked by the advance guard.

They have appealed to Li-Hung-Chang, and demand that he prevent the march of these troops owing to the peace negotiations.

Col. Tullock has returned here. He reports having had an exciting experience. His detachment was fired upon eight miles from Peking. He could not discover the assailants, as they used smokeless powder and modern guns.

He camped for the night at a place called Kao-li-Ying, eighteen miles from here, meeting with slight opposition, but he was informed he would be attacked the next day by Boxers from Deh-hai-Ying, and sent for reinforcements. Fifty men under Lieut. McPherson, of the Twenty-sixth Beloochistan Regiment, were sent to his assistance. Immediately after their arrival Tullock attacked the town, which had to be entered by the use of scaling ladders. In the attack McPherson distinguished himself. He led the scaling party, which reached the town, jumped down into the place, and emptied his revolver, killing five men. He then drew his sword and defended himself until his men arrived in force and saved him from certain death.

Col. Tullock speaks highly of the Lieutenant's action. He says he believes he did a deed which merits the Victoria Cross, a his jump to what was apparently certain death, in order to let his men, who were coming up the ladder, arrive. Fortunately the Chinese had only a few carbines, and were bad shots, and none of the British troops was wounded during the fight. Forty Boxers were killed, a number wounded, and many were captured and brought to Peking.

Owing to the killing of the informer no treasure was obtained.

Tullock says the people of Peking do not realize the contempt in which they are held in the country districts. He adds that one of the wounded Chinamen said while dying:

"You can kill me, but you cannot kill the Boxer movement, which will exist until every foreign devil in China is killed."

The railroad opening, which was to have taken place to-day, has been postponed, owing to the road not being ready for traffic.

As cabled from Peking, under date of Dec. 12, a few days previous to that time the British troops were notified of the existence of treasure twenty miles northwest of Peking, and Col. Tullock, with 100 men, left Peking last Wednesday to investigate the truth of the report. It was stated that a large amount of gold and valuables had been buried by persons connected with the Chinese Court in the latter's flight from the Chinese capital.

The following day, Thursday, Col. Tullock reported the discovery of the body of the man who gave the British information regarding the hidden treasure. He had been decapitated.

BRITISH ATTITUDE DOUBTFUL.

Minister at Peking Forbidden to Sign the Joint Note at Present.

PEKING, Dec. 15.—The British Minister, Sir Ernest M. Satow, has received a communication to the effect that at present he is not authorized to sign the joint note.

He expects definite instructions to-morrow.

PARIS, Dec. 15.—A special dispatch to Le Temps from Shanghai says Prince Ching denies the statement that the Chinese Court will return to Peking. He is also quoted as saying that China will pay a yearly indemnity, but will not make a loan.

THIBET WANTS TO BE FREE.

VANCOUVER, B. C., Dec. 15.—The Rev. Robert Jeffray, who has just returned from six years' mission work in China, says that he is in possession of information that Thibet is anxious to cast off the yoke of China, and has been making overtures first to Great Britain and then to Russia to help her.

She has invited both of these nations to open Thibet to the commerce of the world.

THE GERMAN EXPEDITIONS.

BERLIN, Dec. 15.—A dispatch from Peking under date of Dec. 14 says the Rohrscheidt column found a quantity of arms and ammunition at Tsang. Several fifteen-centimeter guns, still packed in cases, were also found.

Private dispatches from Peking say Lieut. Count von Wintzingerode and Capt. von Usedom have been severely injured by accidents, that Lieut. Dusterberg, in a skirmish near Pao-ting-Foo was killed.

It is added that the Manchu Gen. Fang was captured with great booty.

MANY ARRESTS IN CARACAS.

Fifty-six Prominent Men Charged with Plotting a Revolution.

KINGSTON, Jamaica, Dec. 15.—Advices received here from Demerara, British Guiana, under date of Dec. 5, announce the arrest in Caracas, Venezuela, of fifty-six prominent Venezuelans on the charge of plotting a new revolution.

The arrests, it is added, have created great excitement.

THE TABOGA BACK AT PANAMA.

British Vessel Received by Guard of Honor and Saluted.

COLON, Colombia, Dec. 15.—The British steamer Taboga, which was seized last month by the Colombian Government to transport an armed expedition from Panama to the Port of Buenaventura, where she was used in the bombardment of the rebel position on Points Bazan and Soldade,) has returned to Panama. She was received by a guard of honor and was saluted by a battery.

The British gunboat Pheasant, detailed to inquire into the seizure of the Taboga, has not yet arrived at Panama.

It is understood that the seizure of the Taboga by the Colombian Government will be amicably settled by the payment of a reasonable indemnity to the company owning the steamer, as the charter of the company provided that its steamers could, under certain circumstances, be used by the Colombian Government to transport its troops.

Testimony in Sternberg Case Ended.

BERLIN, Dec. 15.—The Presiding Judge in the Sternberg case announced in court to-day that Herr Popp, Sternberg's bureau chief, and Miss Souchard, an important witness, had fled to parts unknown. The testimony in the case was concluded to-night, and the trial will end during the coming week.

Crimes Against Children in Germany.

BERLIN, Dec. 15.—Referring to the awful conditions which the Sternberg case has shown to exist, the papers comment on the Emperor's official statistics for 1899-1900, showing an increase of 15 per cent. since 1897-8 in crimes against children. There were 1,569 sentences for such offenses alone.

Count von Goetzen's New Post.

BERLIN, Dec. 15.—Count von Goetzen has been ordered to receive a brief training at the Foreign Office, until he starts, in March, to assume the Governorship of Dar-es-Salaam, German East Africa. Before he leaves here Emperor William, with whom the Count studied at school and at Bonn University, will promote him to the rank of Major, to obviate any unpleasantness at his new post.

PARLIAMENT ADJOURNS.

Member Denounced for Declaring that British Troops Have Ill-Treated Boer Women.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—Parliament was dismissed to-day, until the middle of February, with the reading of the shortest Queen's speech ever written. It was as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen:

"I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for the expenses incurred by the operations of my armies in South Africa and China."

The proceedings to-day in the House of Commons were a repetition in miniature of the debates of the brief session. The Ministers were heckled, the war was virulently denounced, and the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain was further attacked. But the war funds were finally voted after the Secretary of State for War, the Right Hon. William St. John Brodrick, had given an assurance that the Government, during recess, would cordially co-operate with Gen. Kitchener in an endeavor to end the war.

Particularly stinging were the remarks of John Bryn-Roberts, (Liberal,) member for the South Eifion Division of Carnarvonshire. He declared that the British treatment of the women of South Africa was an outrage on civilization, and that it was blasphemy to hold Christian services in St. Paul's in connection with the return of Lord Roberts while there were such proceedings in South Africa.

Mr. Brodrick hotly denounced Mr. Bryn-Roberts's charges, asserting that it was criminal to make allegations which could not be proved, but which, however, would be telegraphed to South Africa to increase the discontent existing there. He held up Mr. Bryn-Roberts to the censure and reprobation of every member of the House of Commons. These remarks were greeted with cheers.

Mr. Brodrick then repeated that the Government did not desire to pursue a policy which would make it more difficult for the Boers to cease fighting, and that the Government abided in the declarations of Mr. Chamberlain.

The session was suspended until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when both houses met and were prorogued.

WANTS PRO-BOERS BOYCOTTED.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The scorn and ignominy with which certain Liberal members of Parliament who are avowedly pleased by the Boer successes, are regarded by the major part of the community has by no means decreased.

At a pro-Boer meeting yesterday at which the Right Hon. Leonard H. Courtney presided, Gen. Kitchener's name was greeted with cries of "Villain!" "Butcher!" "Beast!" while mention of Steyn and De Wet elicited loud cheers.

The Pall Mall Gazette to-day editorially declares that such men as Messrs. Courtney, Bryn-Roberts, and Lloyd-George ought to be put in coventry and be boycotted by any self-respecting Englishman. The expedient, severe as it is, is likely to meet with approval in all quarters, not excluding the moderate Liberal journals. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Liberal leader in the House of Commons, does not escape criticism for tacitly permitting his alleged followers to take up such an avowedly anti-British attitude.

SMALL LOSS ON EXPOSITION.

PARIS, Dec. 15.—The official report of the finances of the exposition shows a loss of 2,000,000f.

The total of expenditures is 116,500,000f. The receipts amounted to 114,500,000f.

The loss is less than in the case of either of the preceding expositions.

MORE COMMISSIONERS SAIL.

PARIS, Dec. 15.—The American liner St. Louis, which sailed from Cherbourg this afternoon, took nearly all the members of the American Commission to the Paris Exposition who had not previously departed. Major Brackett, Secretary of the commission, and the accountants will, however, remain for a time in order to effect a final settlement of accounts.

While the American exhibits have not yet been entirely removed from the exposition grounds, with a few exceptions all have been boxed, the contracts providing that they shall be removed by Dec. 26. It is believed that the steamer Prairie will sail with the Government exhibits the first week in January, going to New York, and leaving there the exhibits in the art department, and then proceeding to Baltimore, where she will unload. Major Brackett said this morning he hoped everything would be closed up and he would be able to depart by the middle of January.

LOW ESTIMATE OF AMERICANS.

The Daily Mail Year Book Says There Are No Public Men Here of Conspicuous Merit.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—"The United States have many able men, but no one of conspicuous merit." This statement appears in The Daily Mail Year Book, just issued to compete with Whitaker's Almanack, under the section devoted to the world's chief statesmen. While it is not an inspired or a particularly erudite publication, it unfortunately represents the bulk of press and public opinion in the United Kingdom.

Nothing so well explains the attitude of the British press toward American action in Nicaragua, China, and other quarters of the globe as this crude revelation of its estimate of American public men. It is this underlying, though seldom expressed, belief which permeates the editorials now so frequently devoted to the policy of the Washington Government.

How utterly this is at variance with the opinion of the Foreign Office and the highest Government officials here is apparent from the fact that in almost every recent case where the English papers have attempted to advise or to forecast the attitude of their Government toward propositions suggested by the United States, they have taken exactly the opposite line from the course eventually pursued by Lord Salisbury and the Marquis of Lansdowne. This lack of sympathy between the administration leaders and the administration papers seems to broaden daily.

TO STEER SUBMARINE CRAFT.

Marconi System of Exclusive "Tuning" Said to be Successful.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The British Admiralty has thoroughly wakened up to the importance of submarine and similiar methods of warfare. It has arranged to test Varica's (?) invention for steering torpedoes and submarine boats by means of the system of wireless telegraphy operated by Alfred C. Higgs, the United States Consul at Weymouth. The United States Naval Attaché, Commander Clover, is following up the matter closely. Germany has made an offer for the German rights.

The invention has been considerably altered since it was first shown to the German Government. The inventor now expresses the belief that the danger of interference, or "jamming," as it is technically called, has been eliminated. As recent Marconi experiments prove, instruments not exactly attuned to the same note can have no influence over others, regardless of the power of the batteries. Mr. Higgs provides each torpedo with a different note and directs it from a ship or the land, or under water, toward the object it is desired to destroy, by means of the same current whereby wireless messages are transmitted.

Judgment Against Duke of Manchester.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—Judgment for £250 was entered in the Queen's Bench Division to-day against the Duke of Manchester for wine and cigars supplied by a city merchant. The claim was undefended.

Richard C. Washburn's Will.

The will of Richard C. Washburn, President of the Hudson County National Bank, Jersey City, was filed for probate yesterday in the office of Surrogate James T. Ellis. The estate is valued at $300,000. The property is divided between the testator's three sons, but the youngest, Neil C. Washburn is to receive only the income from his share until he is thirty years old. The two eldest sons, Uriah F. and George T., who are members of the firm of Washburn Brothers, are made the executors. Mrs. Washburn is not named in the will, as she was amply provided for by an ante-nuptial agreement.

NAT GOODWIN AS SHYLOCK.

"The Merchant of Venice" to be Revived—Maxine Elliott to Play Portia.

Nat C. Goodwin announces that when he returns to this city to fulfill his annual engagement at the Knickerbocker Theatre in February it is his intention to give a spectacular revival of "The Merchant of Venice." Mr. Goodwin in a recent interview on the rôle of Shylock, which he will portray, said:

"My nearest ideal of the character was played by the elder Kean, which at the time made a deep impression upon me, and another one which has almost passed from my memory was that of Possard, the distinguished German tragedian, but I desire it understood that the conception which I shall portray will be entirely different from any that has been given heretofore. I fully realize the important step I am about to take, and realize that it is a wide departure from the line of work the theatregoing public have been accustomed to see me in, but nevertheless I hope to present a Shylock that will find favor with the public."

It is more than probable that an all-star cast will be secured to present the play, at all events Maxine Elliott will be seen in the rôle of Portia.

ACCUSED OF ROBBING ACTORS.

James Murray of 606 St. Nicholas Avenue, sometimes known as "The Monk," and employed as a stage hand in the Harlem Opera House, was locked up in the East One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street Station last night, charged with grand larceny.

For some time past actors and actresses playing at the theatre have missed jewelry and wearing apparel. Last evening Detective Enright impersonated a stage hand and watched Murray. Enright said he saw Murray enter the dressing room of Jesse Mulward, a member of one of Frohman's companies now playing at the theatre, and placed him under arrest.

A search of the house where Murray lives resulted in the finding of an overcoat alleged to be the property of Manager Yager of the company which had been stolen three days ago.

Play to Stop, Company to Disband.

"The Sprightly Romance of Marsac," the comedy in three acts by Molly Elliot Seawell and William Young, which was presented in this city for the first time on Dec. 3 at the Theatre Republic as a vehicle for exploiting Maclyn Arbuckle as a star, will after the performance on Dec. 29 temporarily cease to appear. The management announces that it is compelled to disband the company because of its failure to secure a theatre in this city.

Londoners Flock to Hear "Patience."

LONDON, Dec. 15.—The death of Sir Arthur Sullivan has had a curious effect on the popularity of "Patience" at the Savoy. It has so stimulated interest in the composer's work that the audiences are exceeding the records of the first production of the opera, a score of years ago.

THEATRICAL GOSSIP.

Florence Ziegfeld, Jr., has engaged the French eccentric dancers, Les Colinis, to appear with Anna Held in "Papa's Wife," commencing Christmas week at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn.

Ada Deaves, Lilian Coleman, Knox Wilson, and William Riley Hatch and James T. Kelly are new engagements for "The Burgomaster," the musical comedy to be produced at the Manhattan Theatre on New Year's Eve.

The advance sale of seats for Charles Frohman's production of "Alice in Wonderland," with Ellaline Terriss and Seymour Hicks in the leading parts, which is to be presented next Wednesday night at the Vaudeville Theatre, London, has reached over $16,000. It is Mr. Frohman's intention to bring the production to America after it finishes its engagement in London.

Miss Olga Nethersole will appear for the first time as Magda Schwartz in Sudermann's play, "Magda," at the National Theatre, Washington, D. C., on Thursday, Dec. 27. The version to be presented is that prepared by Miss Nethersole herself, and is in three acts. George Wharnock will play the part of old Col. Schwartz, and G. Harrison Hunter will be the Councilor von Keller.

By to-morrow evening the entire Maurice Grau Opera Company will have arrived in this city after their five weeks' preliminary engagement. Some of the principal members of the company arrived last night, others are expected this evening, and the remainder to-morrow night on a special train, which will bring those who sang principal rôles in the last performance, the chorus, the orchestra, scenery, and properties.

The dinner was for young people, and was originally planned for her two granddaughters, Miss Helen Roosevelt and Miss Sarah Van Alen, débutantes of the season. Owing to her mourning for her grandfather, the late James Roosevelt, Miss Roosevelt could not be present. The table was decorated with a centrepiece formed of a raised mirror, on which was placed a boat-shaped centrepiece of silver, filled with several hundred American Beauty roses. At either end of the table were placed huge vases in silver repousse, also filled by Hodgson with American Beauty roses. The silver service was used throughout. Mrs. Astor's guests included Col. OSWALD OTTENDORFER PASSES AWAY

Editor of The Staats-Zeitung Had Long Been an Invalid.

Soldier and Revolutionist in Europe, He Fled to This Country and Took Active Part in Its Affairs.

Oswald Ottendorfer, the editor and proprietor of the New York Staats-Zeitung, died yesterday afternoon, after a lingering illness, at his residence, 150 Central Park South. Mr. Ottendorfer's death was not unexpected, as he had been suffering for many years from a cerebro-spinal affliction, which kept him in an invalid's chair and which more than once brought him so close to death's door that his life was despaired of.

Mr. Ottendorfer was one of the most prominent American citizens of German birth, and as the editor of the Staats-Zeitung, which he built up, he wielded a large influence among the German-American population. Although a Democrat by political conviction he was independent in his views, and during the last two National campaigns supported the candidate of the Republican Party. Mr. Ottendorfer made a fortune with his newspaper, but a large part of his money he gave to charitable institutions and public libraries.

Mr. Ottendorfer's early life was one of romance and excitement. He was born in Zwittau, a small Moravian town on the Bohemian frontier, Feb. 26, 1826. His father was a manufacturer and factory owner in good circumstances. Oswald was the youngest of six children.

The family, while he was still a child, went to live in Galicia, one of the Polish provinces, and, it being intended that young Ottendorfer should have as broad an education as possible, he was sent to live with a married sister in Brünn, the historic capital of Moravia.

Here he was educated after the systematic German fashion until he was twenty years old, when he went to Austria's famous university at Vienna.

It was intended that he should enter the public service, and he was therefore matriculated in the faculty of jurisprudence. After a year of hard study, he was transferred to the university at Prague, that he might learn the Czech language, as well as law. The year 1848 was spent in Vienna, and it was intended that the young jurist should finish his course at Padua, the Venetian university, Venice at that time belonging to Austria.

The Winter of 1847-8 was one of agitation in all the universities of Europe, and the students everywhere prepared to obtain by force the liberties which were otherwise denied to them. Mr. Ottendorfer was active in this movement to overthrow the Metternich Government and joined the Von der Tann volunteer corps, which in the first Schleswig-Holstein war participated in several engagements with the Danish forces.

A POLITICAL EXILE.

During the uprising in Vienna he was First Lieutenant in the battalion that was commanded by Robert Blum. He subsequently joined in the popular revolution in Saxony and Baden, after the failure of which, to escape capital punishment, he fled to Switzerland, and from there came to the United States in one of the small merchant vessels of that time, arriving at this country in the Spring of 1850, just half a century ago. Mr. Ottendorfer in 1865 made an effort to visit his native country, but permission was refused on the ground of the anti-Austrian attitude assumed by The Staats-Zeitung.

"They were shortsighted," said the great editor once in speaking of the incident, "or they would have given me a chance to visit the empire and see for myself whether my views were wrong and where they should have been modified. I did visit the country in 1869, and had occasion to modify my impressions somewhat, owing, however, to the changes which had been brought about since 1866. Königgrätz and the war of 1866 did Austria good and accomplished for it just what Sedan and the war of 1870 did for France."

On reaching this city Mr. Ottendorfer was obliged to obtain employment in a factory as a common laborer. After many trials a subordinate place was offered to him in the counting room of the Staats-Zeitung. The paper was then owned by Mr. Jacob Uhl, who died in 1852, and J. A. Neumann was its editor.

Upon his death the entire management of the property devolved upon his widow, who had previously been active in the business management, and who was possessed of great business tact and energy.

The succeeding years were ones of great prosperity for the paper, a fact due in no small degree to the presence of Mr. Ottendorfer, who in 1858 had been made editor in chief in the office. The acquaintance thus formed between the two leading spirits of the paper resulted, in 1859, in their marriage. Although no children were born to them, their home was not lacking in the attractions of youth; several sons and daughters of Mrs. Ottendorfer by her former marriage found in Mr. Ottendorfer a fond parent. He at once became prominent through the gentlemanly manner which he introduced in his paper while "Rowdy Journalism," so much ridiculed by Charles Dickens, was still ruling.

The great success of The Staats-Zeitung after Mr. Ottendorfer assumed control has been due not only to his indomitable energy and practical ideas of journalism, but also—and chiefly so—to his personal integrity and the devotion with which the principles to which the great majority of German-Americans are unalterably attached.

A man of pronounced opinions and a leading spirit in the political affairs of the day, it was but natural that Mr. Ottendorfer should draw upon himself considerable political antagonism; nevertheless, he always secured a respectful hearing. He partook in a high degree of that characteristic of the German-American population which has gained for them in politics, as in business, a reputation for clear-headedness and independence.

Mr. Ottendorfer for this reason was never a pronounced partisan. He was a thorough student of history, and, while he embraced American institutions with his whole heart, he was fully alive to the dangers which beset them through the doings of politicians and the tendencies of our political and economical development. By the frank statement of these dangers and their causes Mr. Ottendorfer frequently incurred severe criticism, especially on the part of the native population, many of whom attributed his attacks to a lack of reverence for existing institutions. But history proved, as Mr. Ottendorfer argued, that constitutional guarantees equally promising in times gone by had been overthrown by overconfidence in their stability.

In common with many fellow-Germans who came to America simultaneously with himself, he joined the Democratic Party because he saw in it those principles which promised best to preserve free government, the foremost of which is the principle of decentralization. He warmly defended the compromise measures proposed before the war, believing that they presented the only chance of a peaceful solution of the question of slavery.

According to his belief, compromise under a Democratic system of Government was absolutely necessary to prevent conflicts which must overthrow that system. As a champion of liberty in the Old World he was an intense hater of slavery, but at the same time his devotion to the Union did not permit him to endanger its institutions by supporting a radical policy of emancipation.

Consequently he became an ardent supporter of Stephen A. Douglas, with whom he sustained most friendly relations. But when all peace measures failed after the election of Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Ottendorfer saw no other way for the preservation of the Union than by the subjection of the Southern States by military force, and was foremost among the Union war Democrats. It was largely due to him that his party succeeded in electing as Mayor of this city in 1863 a German-American, Godfrey Gunther.

In 1864, 1865, and 1866 Mr. Ottendorfer spent a part of the year in Europe, and when the Prussian-Austrian war broke out, in 1866, he attended it all through as an eye witness. When the Franco-German war broke out, the dreams of his youth—a united Germany—rose before him, and he enthusiastically organized relief societies for the wounded German soldiers. He was foremost in arranging for a fair which resulted in a clear profit of $1,000,000. When that war was over and the German peace festival was held he was one of the chief orators.

AGAINST RECONSTRUCTION POLICY.

At the close of the war of the rebellion he was consistently opposed to the reconstruction policy of the then dominant party. He was bitterly disappointed also with the record of the Democratic Party, and was notably opposed a few years later to the corrupt practices which so thoroughly tainted the name of the party in the local organizations. For this reason he withdrew in 1871, thoroughly disgusted, from the Democratic Party. He was a member of the famous Committee of Seventy which brought order out of chaos after the overthrow of the Tweed régime. In October, 1871, Mr. Ottendorfer appeared as the speaker of the anti-Tammanyites before the Rochester Convention, protesting against the admission of the Tammany delegation.

The support of Mr. Greeley by the Democracy he regarded as a thoroughly un-Democratic proceeding, and actively participated in the movement to nominate an independent Presidential candidate.

Mr. Ottendorfer always strongly urged the abandonment of party lines in the selection of candidates for municipal offices, and any independent movement looking to the overthrow of Tammany rule was sure to receive his hearty support.

He never cared for public office, and the only offices he ever held were those of Regent of the University of New York and Alderman and Supervisor. As a member of the Board of Aldermen in 1872 he was an earnest advocate of those reforms in municipal administration which had become necessary as a result of the doings of the Tweed Ring. In 1874 his friends nominated him for the Mayoralty, and, notwithstanding the want of organization, he received nearly 25,000 votes. In 1875 Gov. Tilden appointed him a member of the committee for the revision of the city charter.

Mr. Ottendorfer warmly supported Mr. Tilden for the Presidency in 1876, and, with several other prominent Democrats, went to New Orleans in November of that year to prevent, if possible, the vote of Louisiana being changed in favor of the Republican candidates. He was so much disgusted by the intrigues of the politicians in New Orleans that he telegraphed to his paper that the very existence of the Union was endangered by the corrupt acts of these intriguing politicians. Mr. Tilden disappointed Mr. Ottendorfer, and The Staats-Zeitung was opposed to his renomination in 1880.

He was always a stanch supporter of Mr. Cleveland, who he believed represented what is best in American political life.

He was one of the Presidential Electors of the Democratic Party for the State of New York in 1892, when Mr. Cleveland was elected President for the second time. During the McKinley-Bryan campaign of 1896 Mr. Ottendorfer supported the Gold Democratic platform and was a candidate for Presidential Elector on the Palmer and Buckner ticket.

During the last National campaign Mr. Ottendorfer was at first inclined to favor Mr. Bryan. As an ardent anti-imperialist he was opposed to the theory of expansion, believing that by the possibilities of militarism the country's institutions and the people's liberty were most seriously threatened. But when Mr. Bryan in his letter of acceptance declared his continued belief in free silver, Mr. Ottendorfer became convinced that the greatest danger to the country lay in the impairment of its financial basis and credit, and he announced his intention to support Mr. McKinley.

While The Staats-Zeitung has continued to reflect Mr. Ottendorfer's views, he himself withdrew some years ago from active newspaper work and from public life. But regularly every Friday, even up to within a few weeks of his death, the heads of the various departments of his paper met at his house in editorial council to talk over the affairs of the office and to decide upon lines of action. About ten years ago the business department of The Staats-Zeitung was given up to the management of Herman Ridder, who has for the last few years undertaken a large share also of the responsibility of the management of the editorial department of the paper.

Mr. Ottendorfer before his death arranged for the continuance of the business without any change. Edward Uhl, the present Vice President of the corporation, succeeds Mr. Ottendorfer as President of The Staats-Zeitung Publishing Company.

HIS NUMEROUS CHARITIES.

Besides other charitable gifts, Mr. Ottendorfer gave $300,000 to build and endow an educational institution in his native town in Austria. Some years ago he established the Ottendorfer Free Library in Second Avenue, in this city, at an original cost of $50,000, which has been augmented by annual gifts. With his wife, who died in 1884, he established in 1873 the Home for Aged Women. This institution was for some years situated at Astoria, L. I., but it was found to be too small for its purpose, and a serious want being felt for a home for old men and chronic invalids, Mr. Ottendorfer erected, at the corner of Tenth Avenue and One Hundred and Ninetieth Steet, new buildings, which were dedicated in October, 1889, the institution receiving the name of Isabella Home, in memory of a dead daughter of Mrs. Ottendorfer. The expense and endowment of this institution amounted to $800,000. Mrs. Ottendorfer contributed $40,000 to an educational fund, built the woman's pavilion of the German Hospital at a cost of $75,000, and gave $100,000 for a German dispensary.

In 1883 she received a gold medal from the Empress of Germany in recognition of her many acts of charity, her will she left bequests to some charitable foundations and bequeathed $25,000 to the employes of The Staats-Zeitung.

For years Mr. Ottendorfer had made an annual gift to each employe of the paper of 10 per cent. of his yearly salary. Mr. Ottendorfer was a Director of the German-American Bank, the German Savings Bank, the German Hospital, and of the German Society. For a number of years he was the President and an active member of the Liederkranz. He was also an incorporator of the Germania Life Insurance Company and the Germania Fire Insurance Company, and started the German Legal Aid Society.

The children of Mrs. Ottendorfer are Edward Uhl, Vice President of The Staats-Zeitung Publishing Company; Mrs. Emma Schalk, wife of Adolph Schalk, the retired brewer, of Newark; Mrs. Matilde Ridl von Riedenstein, wife of Friedrich Ridl von Riedenstein of Dallnitz, near Carisbad, Austria, and Mrs. Anna Woerishoffer, widow of Carl F. Woerishoffer of this city.

The funeral will take place at 11 o'clock Tuesday morning. The arrangements have not yet been completed, but the services will probably be held at Liederkranz Hall, Fifty-eighth Street, near Park Avenue, and the interment will probably be in Greenwood Cemetery.

J. ADDISON PORTER DEAD.

Was Secretary to President McKinley Until Failing Health Caused Him to Resign.

PUTNAM, Conn., Dec. 15.—John Addison Porter, ex-secretary to President McKinley, died at his residence here shortly before 2 o'clock this afternoon. He had been sick for many weeks with a malignant intestinal disease. An operation which was performed nearly two months ago served to stay the progress of his malady, but could not entirely arrest it, and it has been evident for a long time to his family and near friends that he was slowly growing weaker. His condition, however, was such that he was able to sit about the house, and on last Wednesday he went for a drive.

On Thursday he was attacked with a severe sinking spell, and never rallied from it, being unconscious much of the time until his death. Shortly before the end came he recognized the members of his family, who were at his bedside, and bade them farewell.

John Addison Porter was born in New Haven April 17, 1856, and was the eldest son of Prof. John Addison Porter, first Dean of the Yale Scientific School, who died when he was ten years old. His mother was Josephine Earl Sheffield, the daughter of the founder of the school, and he was also a nephew of the late Judge William Walter Phelps, with whom he became closely associated in business and politics. Graduating from Yale in 1878, he devoted himself for a number of years to journalism and literary efforts, though in politics he was long the devoted follower of Major McKinley. He was connected with The New Haven Palladium, The New York Observer, The New York Tribune, and other papers.

In 1883 he married Miss Amy E. Betts of New York. He then went to Washington, where he established a book publishing business, and was for a time a special Senate committee clerk. While here he wrote a monograph on "The Corporation of Yale College," published in 1885, and the following year produced a book, "Sketches from Yale Life," which attracted considerable attention.

He became editor and proprietor of The Hartford Post in 1887, and the paper prospered. Mr. Porter's first appearance in public life was in 1892 as a member of the lower house of the Connecticut Legislature for Pomfret. This town is one of the most aristocratic summer resorts in New England, being the home of many influential families. So much notice did his work bring him that the following year he was a prominent candidate for Governor of the State, and was offered but declined the nomination for Lieutenant Governor. Twice subsequently did he go before Gubernatorial Conventions and show considerable strength.

Mr. Porter was the first President of the McKinley Club of Hartford, the first McKinley club of the country, which was organized in 1893 with 25 members, and which in three years had grown to 700. While the Republicans of the State seemed wildly enthusiastic over Thomas B. Reed for President, Mr. Porter was quietly fostering the McKinley movement, and it is said that it was mainly due to his efforts that seven out of the State's delegation of twelve to the St. Louis Convention were for Major McKinley.

Shortly before President McKinley's inauguration the entire Congressional delegation of the State indorsed Mr. Porter for the position of Ambassador to Italy, and the President-elect invited him to Canton, and on Feb. 3, 1897, the announcement was made that Mr. Porter would succeed Henry T. Thurber as the President's secretary, and to lend dignity to the position the title was changed to "Secretary to the President."

Mr. Porter was always much interested in college matters, and, while not himself famous as an oarsman, he took a leading part in the agitation in favor of inter-university and other boating contests at New London, with the ultimate view of an annual carnival similar to the Henley regatta.

He was a tall, stout man, of imposing figure, until his health became permanently impaired by a severe illness nearly two years ago. He frequently had to be relieved from the onerous duties of his office, and finally tendered his resignation, which the President reluctantly accepted, to take effect on May 1 of the present year. He leaves a wife and two children.

DEATH LIST OF A DAY.

Hamilton Harris.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Dec. 15.—Hamilton Harris, ex-Senator, Regent of the university, and attorney, died Friday morning at the age of eighty-one. To the last he was engaged in the active practice of his profession, and was practically stricken while arguing a railroad damage case early in the present week. At the close of his argument he retired to his home, and two hours later lost consciousness. He sank rapidly, and life passed away just before noon on Friday. The immediate cause of death is given as blood poisoning, originating from a bruise on the leg.

Hamilton Harris was born at Preble, Cortland County, N. Y., May 1, 1820. He was graduated from Union College in 1841. In the Autumn of 1845 he was admitted to the bar, and from that time down to his death his name appeared constantly in the reports of the highest court in the State. He came to Albany in 1845 and opened offices. In the Fall of 1853 Mr. Harris was elected District Attorney of Albany County, serving until Jan. 1, 1857.

In 1850 he was elected a member of the Assembly from Albany County. He was a member of the Republican State Committee from 1864 to 1870. He was elected President of a new Board of Capitol Commissioners in 1865, serving until 1875. The same year he was elected to the State Senate. In 1877 he was re-elected. In 1885 he was chosen Regent of the University of the State of New York.

He retired from politics several years ago, and devoted himself wholly to the practice of law. The funeral services will be held Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock at the family residence on Broadway.

Gustav Rothenberg.

Gustav Rothenberg, senior member of the dry goods firm of Rothenberg & Co., 34-42 West Fourteenth Street, died at his residence, in West Seventy-first Street, yesterday morning of typhoid fever. He was born in Hanover, Germany, forty-three years ago. He came to the United States in 1882 after serving the regulation time in the German Army. He entered the employ of Meyer Jonasson & Co., and made such rapid progress in business advancement that in 1886 he became a member of the firm of Blumenthal Brothers & Co., manufacturers of suits and cloaks, 452 Broadway. He continued with this house until Jan. 1, 1896, when he purchased the business of Ludwig Brothers, in Fourteenth Street, and which developed into the firm of Rothenberg & Co. Mr. Rothenberg was a member of the Harmonie and Freundschaft organizations. He is survived by a widow and four children.

Edgar Pinchot.

Edgar Pinchot, for some years a resident and business man of this city, died on Friday at his home, Milford, Penn. He was born in Milford seventy-five years ago, and was a son of Cyril Pinchot, a native of France. Edgar Pinchot came to this city in 1857 from Milford, and from 1859 until 1874 he was engaged in the wholesale drug business at 214 Fulton Street, his firm being Pinchot & Bruen.

Mr. Pinchot retired from active business in 1874 because of ill-health. Although not a lawyer, Mr. Pinchot was appointed to a Judgeship at Milford by the Governor of Pennsylvania about ten years ago to fill out an unexpired term. He was an active Republican.

PLANS FOR CUP DEFENSE

SHAMROCK II. TO MEET WINNER

Secrecy Maintained on Both Sides of Atlantic Concerning Two Contestants for the Yacht Trophy.

It is now two months since the arrival on this side of the Atlantic of Sir Thomas Lipton's second challenge for the America's Cup, and plans preparatory to the real work of the defense have been completed only within the past week. Sir Thomas, with the valuable experience of defeat behind him, spent a year of thought upon means for improving his chance of success before issuing his challenge. The New York Yacht Club's officers, as trustees of the famous trophy, proceeded with confident deliberation in their planning for its defense. The clamor of the general public, and of even the rank and file of the club, for news of some definite action was disregarded. It was a full month after the arrival of Sir Thomas's second challenge before a syndicate of club members was formed to subscribe for a new yacht to defend the trophy, and only two days ago that arrangements were completed for the management of the old defender Columbia in trial races with the new boat.

There has been, however, one sensational element in the preparations for the defense in striking contrast to Sir Thomas's year of planning and the New York Yacht Club's deliberate and rather secretive course. This was the altogether unexpected announcement by Thomas Lawson, the Boston stock broker and financier, of his intention to build a boat to compete against the New York syndicate's yacht for the honor of defending the cup. Nebulous when first announced, ten days ago, the plans for the designing, building, and sailing of the Boston boat are now complete. The many details essential to preparation for such an undertaking were worked out with a dash that has done much to sweep the sympathy of the general public toward the new-comer, although his rather ruthless disregard of a precedent, which has hitherto confined aspirants for the privilege of defending the cup to members of the New York Yacht Club, earned him some condemnation.

FIVE YACHTS PREPARING.

There will stand forth then, in the preparations for the international races that are to mark the semi-centennial of the winning of the cup by the old schooner America, three figures of prominence, namely: Sir Thomas's new challenger, Shamrock II., and the two rival trial defenders. Of minor interest are the two older boats, Shamrock I. and Columbia, which last year occupied the centre of the yachting stage. These two will be used as trial horses, respectively, for the new challenger and new defenders.

The cursory and occasionally conflicting reports which have from time to time been given out regarding the plans and progress on both sides of the Atlantic have confused even well-informed yachting men. The following paragraphs are accordingly given in summary of situation as it now is:

Sir Thomas Lipton's challenge, as last year, came through the Royal Ulster Yacht Club. All arrangements for the international races will, accordingly, be agreed upon jointly by representatives of the New York Yacht Club, as the defenders and trustees of the cup, and of the Royal Ulster Yacht Club as challenger. The New York Yacht Club has appointed a special committee of nine members for the purpose of arranging these details. This committee is made up of men experienced in the conduct of international races, including, as it does, Commodore Lewis Cass Ledyard, ex-Commodores D. Morgan, E. M. Brown, and J. Pierpont Morgan; Vice Commodore August Belmont, Rear Commodore C. L. F. Robinson, Secretary J. V. S. Oddie, S. Nicholson Kane, and C. Oliver Iselin. Early in the Spring it is expected that the Royal Ulster's representatives will meet with the New York Yacht Club's committee in this city, and the dates, courses, and special rules governing the races will then be agreed upon.

The challenge expressed preference for a series of the best three out of five races, and for the first three races suggested the dates Aug. 20, 22, and 24, the remaining events, if any be required, to be sailed on corresponding days in the weeks following. These dates, which are earlier than usual, are set for America's Cup races since the contests between the Madeleine and Countess of Dufferin in 1876, will probably be agreed upon finally at the meeting of the two committees. There is also no doubt that the races will again be sailed over thirty-mile courses, alternately triangular and "one windward and leeward," off Sandy Hook. From unofficial sources there have been suggestions of a removal of the scene to Newport, but tradition, simplicity of tidal conditions, and Sir Thomas's expressed preference all pull toward a continuance of the races off Sandy Hook.

OLD RULES WILL GOVERN.

The rules adopted will in all probability be identical with those governing last year's races, with the exception of the time limit for starting.

Of Sir Thomas Lipton's new challenger, Shamrock II., it is known that she is to be designed by George L. Watson, managed by W. G. Jameson, sailed by Capt. Edward Sycamore, and that she is now building. Where the yacht is being constructed is secret to her owner, designer, and builders, and, with this secret, there rests also uncertainty as to the material from which the yacht will be constructed. There are now under way at the yards of Henderson & Co., at Fairlie, Scotland, a yacht of challenger size from designs by George L. Watson, but there is also building at Denny & Co.'s yards, at Dumbarton, a yacht of similar dimensions from the boards of the same designer. One is for Sir Thomas, and the other for the Prince of Wales, but which is which no one but the principals has yet learned. The Henderson boat is to be built of composite material; that is, she will have nickel-steel frame, with wooden planking, while the Denny boat is to have a metal hull. The question of builders has therefore more than casual significance in the case of the new challenger. Both of the yachts are being built behind carefully-guarded doors, so that Sir Thomas and his designer may be able to keep their secret. As to the lines of the new Shamrock, inference has been drawn from Watson's latest boats, notably the Sybarita, that she will have a greater beam than any previous challenger, and that her curves will flow more gently than in the typical smart-looking, sharply-turned British cutter. Her sail spread, according to report, will be enormous, greater than that of any previous challenger, and economy of weight will be sought elsewhere than in the spars. The new Shamrock, it is expected, will be afloat by May 1, and will be tuned up in the Solent in trial races against the old Shamrock, which is now being refitted in her cup-race form for that purpose.

Of the two new defenders the one that has been ordered by the syndicate of New York Yacht Club members was designed by "Nat" Herreshoff, and will be built at the Herreshoff yard in Bristol, R. I. The subscribing syndicate is made up of August Belmont, James Stillman, Oliver H. Payne, and Frederick G. Bourne, of this city, and Henry Walters of Baltimore. W. Butler Duncan, Jr., who managed the Defender in the trial races against Columbia last year, is to be the manager of the new boat, and Capt. Urias Rhodes, a native American, who sailed the Defender last year, will be her skipper. Work has already been begun on the new yacht at Bristol. It is known that her hull will be of Tobin bronze, but absolutely nothing is known by outsiders regarding her lines or sail plan. The usual Herreshoff secrecy has so far proved impervious to seekers after information. The successive defenders turned out by "Nat" Herreshoff, however, have shown a progressive increase in beam, increase in overhang, and decrease of underbody. His boats of the smaller classes turned out during the past season showed these same differences over the craft he designed last year. It is consequently argued with show of reason that the new defender will have a somewhat longer forward overhang and a slightly broader beam than the Columbia, and that her underbody will be cutaway more sharply than in the older boat. Her sail area, it is believed, will certainly not be smaller than that of the Columbia. The new yacht will in all likelihood be called Eagle. She will be ready for trial races early in May, a full month earlier than the Columbia was.

The Boston trial defender will be owned solely by Thomas Lawson, who is a member of the Hull-Massachusetts Yacht Club. E. B. Crowninshield is her designer and she will be built by the Lawleys of South Boston. Capt. "Nate" Watson, a Yankee yachting skipper of long experience, will be her sailing master. Associated with Mr. Lawson as active managers of the boat and in an advisory capacity will be Charles Francis Adams 2d, C. E. Hodges, Robert W. Emmons, Frank Crowninshield, and Dr. Henry Bryant, all of whom are amateurs of the highest ability, experience, and standing in Massachusetts yachting. The lines of the new boat, which, after work has begun, will not be kept secret, according to Mr. Lawson's promise, are sure to prove of interest to all yachtsmen, for they will embody the ideas of a successful young designer whose experience, however, has hitherto been confined among racing craft to the smaller classes. So far no word has escaped Mr. Crowninshield regarding the chief features of the new yacht's design, but, drawing conclusions from his smaller boats, yachtsmen expect to find a more conservative type than that of Herreshoff's recent racing machines. They expect a shallow boat, but one with less forward overhang and somewhat more body to hang the heavy lead keel upon. Her sail plan, it is thought, will be less conservative, exceeding in area, perhaps, that of the Columbia. The Boston boat, it is promised, will also be ready for racing by May 15. The two new yachts and the Columbia will come together shortly thereafter in the first of their series of trial races.

Boston Yachtsmen Met.

BOSTON, Dec. 15.—The Executive Committee of the new Boston cup defender, which committee is composed of local yachtsmen, who will take charge of the new boat at the request of Mr. Lawson, held a meeting this afternoon at the office of Designer Crowninshield and discussed the boat in a general way with Mr. Crowninshield. Sailmaker Wilson was present with samples of duck made especially for the Boston boat. In getting up the material and in the make of the sails his experience of thirty years' practical experimenting and sailmaking will be relied on. After the meeting one of the members of the committee said:

"Yacht naval architecture has now developed to a point where the leading designers are working along the same lines, and it is my opinion that there will be a great similarity in the type of boats built by the different designers here."

The speaker added that Mr. Lawley, who has the contract, states that work will begin under a shed which is to be built on the Atlantic Works, East Boston, next week. About the design itself, the committee is working upon the lines which showed good results in the Columbia, and is taking special care in preparing for emergencies. The gentleman quoted is a member of the New York Yacht Club.

It is the opinion of those in touch with the committee having charge of the Lawson boat, that the committee thinks Herreshoff will have a wider and longer over-all boat in the new defender than he had in the Columbia, and it would not be surprising if the Lawson boat and the New York syndicate boat were but a few inches apart on the extreme beam dimensions, the shape of the lateral plane, the area of wetted surface, and with about the same displacement. The situation is about that Mr. Herreshoff is working on known data and on an improved Columbia, while Crowninshield is working on a boat which he believes will beat the Columbia.

Work on Defender Progressing.

BRISTOL, R. I., Dec. 15.—Work progressed all day on the mold for the new defender's lead keel at the Herreshoff's shop and to-night it is all but one-third completed. It has not yet been put upon the cradle, and will not be until it is entirely finished. This, it is expected, will not be until next Tuesday night. Then the mold will be stayed in position, banked with red clay, and made ready to receive the molten metal. There is much anxiety concerning the nonarrival of the lead from the West. Ninety-five tons were ordered from Colorado, and it is known that it was shipped from Chicago several weeks ago. It has been sidetracked somewhere between here and Chicago, but the railroad officials seem to be unable to locate its present whereabouts. The angle iron for the frames is expected early next week. All work is, however, kept back pending the arrival of the lead.

CRESCENT A. C. AT THE TRAPS.

Two Gunners Tie for Third December Cup Shoot.

The third weekly shoot for the December Cup at the Crescent Athletic Club traps yesterday afternoon resulted in a tie between L. C. Hopkins and Dr. H. L. Keyes, each with a total of 40 targets. Hopkins had a handicap of 9 added to his score at the expert traps and 8 at the Magau traps.

Dr. Keyes had the same allowance as Hopkins at the expert traps, but received 1 less at the Magau traps. The tie will be shot off in the regular match next Saturday.

The weekly trophy shoot was won by W. G. McConville, who scored a double victory, as his tie of the preceding week with G. W. Hagedorn was decided in his favor by the same scores. The shoot for a panel of stuffed game was won by C. S. S. Remsen. A number of sweepstakes also were decided. The summaries:

Welch Wins at Inter-State Park.

R. A. Welch of the Carteret Gun Club scored a win in the weekly shoot of the New Utrecht Gun Club for a Mauser rifle at the Inter-State Park traps yesterday afternoon, making a total of 18 birds killed and 1 miss. A ten-bird sweepstakes also was decided. The scores:

Flushing Gun Club Shoot.

Edward J. Clarke looked like a winner at the shoot of the Flushing Gun Club, held on the grounds of the organization midway between Flushing, L. I., and Jamaica, yesterday, until the shoot off, but he failed after tieing with Capt. William A. Sands and A. Doncourt, to stop his eleventh bird. The main event was at 25 birds per man. A series of sweepstake races followed, in which Hendrickson, Doncourt, Clarke, and Capt. Sands and Knapp garnered most of the money in sight.

Cox Won Glen Cove Club Medal.

Special to The New York Times.

GLEN COVE, L. I., Dec. 15.—Stephen Cox became the custodian of the handsome medal offered by the Glen Cove Gun Club for the best record in its trap-shooting events of the season, in the programme decided to-day on the club's grounds here. In the main event, at twenty-five birds, Walter Campbell was the runner-up to Cox, losing on the shoot-off, after a tie with the winner.

Indoor Football a Failure.

Two elevens, exponents of indoor football, met in the American Horse Exchange, at Fiftieth Street and Broadway, last evening, prepared to entertain, as they hoped, a large crowd of spectators. About 100 people sat awaiting the contest at 25 cents a head. The management said that, as there was only $12.50 in gate receipts, the game could not proceed unless sufficient money for the rent was forthcoming. The teams could not raise the amount needed, and so the game did not take place.

ATHLETES GAMES INDOORS

Annual Contests of Columbia University in 8th Regt. Armory.

EVERY EVENT WELL FILLED

New West Side's Sprinter Runs a Dead Heat in the Sixty-Yard Dash with Fried.

Columbia's athletes held their second annual indoor games at the Eighth Regiment Armory last night, and, despite a late start, ran off a lengthy programme of events in excellent style. Trials were necessary in most of the track events on account of the large number of starters. The open sixty-yard handicap run had thirty-nine entries, necessitating six trials and a final for its decision. The final resulted in a dead heat between T. J. Fitzpatrick of the New West Side Athletic Club and H. Fried of the Star Athletic Club. Fitzpatrick won in the run off by a slight margin.

The most interesting of the events was the interclass relay race, in which teams from the senior, junior, and freshman classes competed. Each team was composed of four men, each of whom ran two laps, or an eighth of a mile. The senior representative, Van Case, led throughout the first two laps, giving an advantage of about three yards to Meehan, who succeeded him.

Martin, 1903, was second and Goodwin, 1904, third. This order was maintained by the second relay during their first lap, but in their second lap Carlton, 1904, passed Martin, 1903, and gave his class second place in that relay. In the third relay the order was, 1901, 1903, and 1904, only a few yards separating the three runners. The last relay was entered upon in this order, but Ogden, 1903, passed Barker, 1901, in the first half lap, and had gained a lead of three or four yards when he slipped on the turn and fell, losing what appeared to be a certain victory for his class. The finish was: Barker, 1901, first; Morse, 1904, second; Ogden, 1903, third.

Another relay race was run between teams representing the Twenty-second and Twenty-third Regiments, respectively, but the event lost much of its interest on account of the ease with which the Twenty-second Regiment team won, after leading throughout the entire race. The final quarter was run by M. W. Long for the Twenty-third Regiment, and W. S. Edwards for the Twenty-second. It was thought that Long might win the race for the Brooklyn regiment, but Edwards' advantage of about thirty yards was too great to be overcome, and the Twenty-second Regiment man won by an ample margin.

It had been hoped that Long would make a record in his quarter mile, but the timers were so engrossed in watching the race that they neglected to take the time of his start.

Notable individual performances were the winning of both the hurdles from scratch by S. Barker, 1901, and C. B. Marshall's (1902, L.,) good win from scratch in the closed mile handicap event. The summaries:

CO. I WON THE TOD CUP.

Athletes Earned a Sweeping Victory in the Seventy-first Regiment's Armory Games.

The men from Company I swept almost everything before them in the annual Fall athletic games of the Seventy-first Regiment, which were held last night in the armory, at Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street. For the fourth consecutive time the J. Kennedy Tod Cup, which is awarded each year to the company team scoring the greatest number of points, fell to their possession. Eight first prizes and 50 out of a possible 99 points were won by the Company I boys. Theirs was also the victorious team in the relay race. Company K, with 15 points, took second honors in the meet.

Company I's sweeping victory was due to the speed and strength of three members of her team—G. T. Fitzgerald, P. B. McCahill, and J. W. Slawson. McCahill finished easily first in the two sprints and the hurdle race. "Garry" Fitzgerald clipped one and three-fifth seconds off his own and the armory record in the mile run, and the 220-yard half mile and quarter mile runs, while Slawson took care of both field events with like satisfaction to his company. These three men were responsible for I's eight firsts, while A. W. Stone and C. Beatus brought up the total score by seconds and thirds in the 65-yard sprint and the 220-yard half mile and quarter mile runs.

Nearly 3,000 spectators, more than half of whom were women, filled the galleries of the armory, and with the music of the regimental band to heighten the excitement of the contests, the games were run off with lively interest. The many trial heats of the 65-yard run were the first events of the programme, and it took seven of them to reduce the thirty-five men entered to the fourteen contestants admitted to the semi-finals. McCahill showed his mettle by winning his trial heat in :07 1-5, the best time made in the seven heats. The final he won easily, finishing a full six yards ahead of his nearest opponent, who was C. Beatus, another Company I man.

Fitzgerald first came to the front in the quarter-mile scratch run, in which all the contestants were accoutred with knapsack, blanket, and gun, in heavy marching order. Out of eight starters in this event, the second on the programme, all but three fell by the wayside under the weight of their accoutrements. Fitzgerald led the three by a good eight yards at the finish, while R. W. Taylor of Company K passed R. J. Sayles of Company H on the last lap, and finished second by scarcely more than a stride.

The one-mile handicap run, in which Fitzgerald covered the distance from scratch in 4:57 1-5, and thereby broke his own and the armory record, proved the best event of the evening from an athletic standpoint. Fitzgerald ran a heady race, taking the lead in the eighth lap and finishing a full twenty yards to the good. In the relay race Company I's team displayed equal generalship, and had the event won after the first relay.

The obstacle race, which closed the programme, furnished the greatest amusement to the spectators. This event consisted of a one-sixth-mile run of two laps around the circular track. Intervals were placed tions, hurdles, barrels, and a net. The barrels had to be crawled through, and the net had to be crawled under. J. Waring of Company F, took the lead after the first hurdle, but H. Rabing of Company D passed him in the last fifty yards, and won by a bare stride. The summaries:

The H. S. Hart Benefit Programme.

All arrangements have been made for the sporting show at the Grand Central Palace for the benefit of the family of the late Hugh S. Hart, and from all indicattons the affair will be a notable success. Effort has been made to gather the past and present champions of every branch of sport which can be put upon the stage in attractive style. Great interest is attached to the meeting of Jeffries, the champion heavyweight pugilist, and Ernest Roeber, the champion wrestler of the world, in a catch-as-catch-can contest. It is not thought that Jeffries possesses enough science to actually throw Roeber, but there is considerable speculation as to how long it will be before the wrestling champion will overcome the strength of the fighter and the latter's shoulders will be pinned down to the mat. There are other features of almost equal attraction. Paul Pons, the French champion, who is now matched with Roeber for the world's championship, has offered $500 through W. A. Brady to any man that he cannot throw in one hour. There are said to be two or three well-known wrestlers willing to meet Pons, and the first that comes will receive the opportunity.

Scientific sparring will be another feature. Jim Corbett will put on the gloves, and Tom Sharkey, Peter Maher, Gus Ruhlin, and many others almost equally prominent will take part in the show. Rolando, the rival of Sandow, also will appear. The programme follows:

Strength.—Rolando.

Rowing.—Edward Hanlon and "Davy" Roach.

Handball.—Phil Casey vs. Athletic Instructor E. J. Giannini.

Columbia May Play Stanford.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 15.—The University of California football team will meet the Columbia 'Varsity eleven of New York in this city on Christmas and in Los Angeles on New Year's Day. The arrangements, which had nearly been completed, for Columbia to play Stanford University, fell through, but the Californians are assured that the Eastern players will accept the terms they offer.

At the Columbia football quarters, in West One Hundred and Seventeenth Street, it was said last night that no negotiations were being held with the University of California for a game during the Christmas holidays, but that Manager Shoemaker was still in correspondence with the management of the Leland Stanford University eleven.

Flushing Hunt Club's Run.

FLUSHING, L. I., Dec. 15.—A number of prominent Flushing people followed the hounds to-day at the informal drag hunt of the Flushing Hunt Club, the start being made on the old Bowne farm. A pack of eight imported fox hounds led the riders at a merry clip, and as the country is rough, some fine jumping was witnessed. Miss Emily Bell, on Minne, her thoroughbred bay mare, was first in at the death, and was followed by H. G. Murray on his hunter, Jack o' Hearts. A hunt luncheon was served at the Oakland Golf Club house after the run. Among those who were out were H. G. Murray, Mr. and Mrs. James A. Renwick, Morgan Grace, James C. McMurtrye, Miss Willetts, Miss Edith Embury, Mr. Edward Popham, Miss Otterson, Edward Gage, Miss Sarah Leavitt, Joseph Grace, Miss Beatrice Pell, William R. Grace, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Meirere, Thomas Willetts, Jr., John R. Turpin, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Carroll, Miss Amy Talbot, and Miss Emma Rodman.

ATLANTA, Ga., Dec. 15.—It is announced here that J. H. Barrett, General Superintendent of Transportation of the Southern Railway, has resigned. He will identify himself with an important Northern line.

DOUGLAS WON GOLF TROPHY.

Davis of Lakewood Beaten in the Final of Atlantic City Club Tournament.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. Dec. 15.—Findlay S. Douglas of the Fairfield Golf Club won the chief trophy to-day in the golf tournament of the Atlantic City Country Club by beating W. S. Davis of the Lakewood Club by a score of 4 up and 3 to play. The weather was fair and cold.

The real struggle of the Fall golf tournament of the Seashore Club began this morning with the semi-finals for the Atlantic City Cup, the chief trophy of the tournament. Findlay S. Douglas met A. M. Robbins, St. Andrew's, and W. C. Fownes, Jr., Highland, was paired with L. Davis, Lakewood. Last April Davis beat Douglas, and much interest was manifested this morning in the result of the semi-finals, the impression being that the two would meet again in the finals this afternoon.

Douglas in his match with Davis showed an improvement all through the tourney in his putting. The cards read:

Players Determined that League Managers Will Abdicate.

CONFERENCES WILL BE HELD

National League Further Defies Players by Announcing a Cut in Salaries for Next Year.

The next move toward solution of the tangle in professional baseball, and settlement of the differences between the National League managers and the players, in all probability, will be announced to-day, and the result of a conference between Charles Zimmer, Clark Griffiths, and Hugh Jennings, the members of the committee representing the Players' Protective Association, and their lawyer, Harry Taylor, in Buffalo. The committee telegraphed to Taylor and arranged for a conference immediately after the League managers threw out the players' demands for modification of the terms under which players are signed, and the consultation is expected to take place to-day. The players, who left New York Friday night, directly after the adjournment of the League meeting, could not say at that time what would be their future plan of action, but all agreed that, though beaten so far, and utterly defied by the club owners and managers, they would not give up the fight. The concessions the players ask are only those mentioned in the open meeting early in the week, which were that the "farming" of players be abolished, that the term of contract under which a club may hold players be limited to a stipulated number of years, and that the players shall have some say in the matter before their services are sold or traded off by the managers holding them under contract. These concessions seem only reasonable and in accord with accepted ideas of individual right, but the League managers, under the pretext that the requests made publicly and those preferred later in a written abstract of the new contract asked by the players, did not agree, rejected the players' overtures in positive terms, and practically defied the ball-tossers to better their condition by carrying out the talked-of strike, or affiliating with "Ban" Johnson and his new American League. How far the managers went in ignoring the players is illustrated in the treatment which a communication, addressed by the players' committee to A. H. Soden, Chairman of the committee which heard the players, following the first refusal of the League to concede what the players asked. This concerned a proposition by the players to present an amended petition.

The Players' Committee never heard a word about their communication until the League meeting was adjourned Friday night, when Chairman Zimmer was informed by Mr. Soden that the appeal came too late to be considered, and so had not even been presented to the League. As matters now stand the real fight is postponed until the February meeting of the League, when players' contracts must be renewed. The League managers hold that the option clause in existing contracts binds the players for next year. In that connection, so sure are they of holding the players, that they actually adopted a resolution providing for a reduction all around in the salaries to be paid for the season of 1901. The players, by their statements, are prepared to hold out against the renewing of contracts, and, in fact, are bound to hold together by their agreement when the Protective Association of Professional Baseball Players, which is as follows:

Each member, by signing his name hereto, promises and agrees to enter into no contract or agreement of employment of any kind with any professional baseball club or association where players are members of this association or the owner or any representative thereof, unless said contract or the form thereof has been approved in writing by the attorney for this association.

Another matter of interest to patrons of baseball is the agreement by the League, in the form of a resolution, providing that no club shall have more than sixteen players under contract, and that in case more players are signed, the latest of the sixteen engaged at that time shall be released to keep the number down to th stipulated limit. Persons who pretend to know baseball politics argue that this resolution was a bit of strategy aimed at the Brooklyn Club by managers of other teams, who expect to strengthen their clubs by snapping up such of last season's champions as the sixteen limit would cause Brooklyn to release. It is every-said that the resolution was for the special benefit of the New York and Cincinnati Clubs, which are badly in need of good players. A weak point in the rule, however, is that no penalty is provided for violation of the agreement and therefore it is most improbable that the Brooklyn Club will arm its opponents by giving up a part of its strength.

Harvard Slights Princeton's Team.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 15.—The Harvard management gave out a statement to-day relative to the printed reports from Princeton in regard to the break in negotiations between the two colleges. It says:

"The report that the negotiations for baseball games between Princeton and Harvard have been broken off is correct. The fact that Princeton demanded three games or more made it impossible to arrange our dates."

Among the athletic circles at Harvard it is said that the root of the trouble is that Princeton considered the Harvard series a championship games, while Harvard looked at them only as practice games in developing its team, with the idea of defeating Yale.

Southern Baseball League Formed.

ATLANTA, Ga., Dec. 15.—The Southern Association of Baseball Clubs was formed in this city to-night, and, although only seven clubs have been accepted, the baseball men went into session at the Kimball House at 9 o'clock this evening for the purpose of completing the organization.

The cities granted franchises are New Orleans, Memphis, Nashville, Birmingham, Chattanooga, Little Rock, and Shreveport. The promoters of the league hope to secure either Atlanta or Mobile as the eighth club, but do not believe that it will be possible to complete the circuit before Monday.

Rusie Signed with Cincinnati.

MUNCIE, Ind., Dec. 15.—Amos Rusie stated to-day that he had signed with President J. T. Brush of Cincinnati, to play with the Cincinnati team next season. He stated he would assure Brush a stronger club this year than in the past. His pitching arm is in good condition, and it will need little training. He expressed the desire to play with Cincinnati, but objected to playing with the New York team.

ATHLETICS IN COLUMBIA.

Report of the Faculty Committee Shows a Flourishing Condition in College Sports.

The Faculty Committee on Athletics at Columbia has submitted its first annual report to President Low. Among other things, the report estimates that 1,600 students of the university went into sport for its own sake, which number includes only those men who were selected as members of the different teams. Those who actually participated as team members in the different games were 461, apportioned among the several branches of sport as follows: Track team, 109; boat crew, 80; gymnastic team and strength tests, 69; lacrosse team, 47; baseball, 40; football, 36; cycle team, 29; hockey team, 21; golf team, 12; swimming and water polo teams, 9; tennis, 6; fencing team, 3.

Contained in the report is a summary of all the athletic contests in which the university participated in the course of the year, including the names and schools of the students taking part and the results of the different events. It appears, from the report, that "representatives of the university have participated in eighty games, races, or meets with students of other colleges or universities or of athletic associations, in addition to twenty-two contests in which freshmen have been engaged, and twelve home games." Particular emphasis is laid on the victories of the strength test team as it was truly representative of the university as a whole, including men from all of the different schools.

It is planned to have sets of rules and directions printed and distributed among the managers, Captains, and members of the different teams, which will provide for the exclusion of any element of professionalism in the athletics of the university and will be strictly enforced. President Low's attitude toward college sport and purity in athletics is expressed in his annual report, as follows: "Such sports make men of temperate lives the students' heroes; they help large numbers of men to pass safely through the critical period of young manhood; they develop self-restraint, self-discipline, courage, staying power, and many of the qualities that tell powerfully in the battle of life; they offer to the educator an instrument whose training value no wise man will neglect. The problem is to check as many as possible of the abuses of intercollegiate athletics and to develop all that is good in them."

In the Faculty Committee for the coming year, Prof. James F. Kemp will take the Chairmanship, which was vacated by the resignation of Prof. F. R. Hutton. The other members will be Prof. George W. Kirchwen of the School of Law and Prof. George E. Woodberry of the Department of Comparative Literature. Dr. Watson L. Savage, while not serving on the committee, will act as its Secretary and as a means of communication between the students and the Faculty.

ADELPHI WON AT HANDBALL.

Beat Latin School of Brooklyn Five in Six Games.

Adelphi Academy scored a victory yesterday morning in its own gymnasium over the team from the Brooklyn Latin School in the first round of the tournament for the decision of the Handball Championship Cup of the Long Island Interscholastic Athletic League. The conditions were best five in nine games, and only six games were played, the home team winning five of them and taking the first round of the tourney. The best contested game of the series was one between R. L. Mason of Latin School and R. S. Kelly of Adelphi, in which but three points separated the players at the finish. The summaries:

First Game.—J. W. Ketcham, Brooklyn Latin School, defeated Robert S. Salter, Adelphi Academy, 21 to 17 points. Second Game—E. B. Humpstone, Adelphi Academy, defeated R. L. Mason, Latin School, 21 to 8 points. Third Game—R. S. Kelly, Adelphi Academy, defeated R. L. Mason, Latin School, 21 to 18 points. Fourth Game—E. B. Humpstone, Adelphi Academy, defeated J. B. Umpires and Scorers—Archie Jellifte, Adelphi Academy, and R. L. Barber, Brooklyn Latin School.

Athletic at New York University.

This year will be the banner year in athletics at the New York University, if present indications count for anything. The financial standing of the Athletic Association was never better. According to the Treasurer's report every one of the four teams turned over a balance to the Athletic Association. The sums turned in were: Football, $115; baseball, $182; track, $40; gymnastic, $67. This leaves the association without a single cent of indebtedness. Next Wednesday the Executive Committee of the Athletic Association will meet for the purpose of ratifying the elections of Captains and managers for the year. The men slated for positions are: Football Captain, undecided, Manager Charles L. Thorne, 1902; baseball Captain, Charles A. Taylor, 1901; manager, William A. Young, 1901; track Captain, Samuel S. Jones, 1902; manager, T. W. Metcalfe, 1901; gymnastic team, Captain undecided, Manager Harry C. Magnus, 1901. The gymnastic team will open the season on Wednesday evening, when the annual gymnastic exhibition will be given in the gymnasium at University Heights. After the Christmas recess the track team will begin the indoor athletic contest for the Bank's Cups. The candidates for the baseball team will begin indoor work after the midyear examinations.

More Money for Columbia Athletics.

Active measures are being taken by the students of Columbia to relieve the strained financial situation of the athletic association made public by the report of the general athletic Treasurer. Every effort is being put forth by the student body to make up to the guarantors of Manhattan Field the amounts which they lost through the small profits of the season. A committee composed of managers and assistant managers has been organized to solicit subscriptions from the undergraduates, and about $1,000 has been secured in this way. In regard to the report of the football manager there is a general feeling among the students that the team was managed on much too grand a scale, and that the money which was consumed in lavish expenditures should have been used toward paying the rent of Manhattan Field. The sentiment prevalent among the student body is expressed by The Spectator, the undergraduate newspaper, which speaks editorially as follows: "Under the circumstances, economy would have been a credit to a manager and parsimony a virtue. We hope that a sense of the fitness of things will gradually dawn upon us here at Columbia, and that we will hesitate before we spend money which, unspent, could be not unwisely devoted to the paying of our debts."

Students to be Assessed for Athletics.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 15.—A committee appointed recently by the managers of the various athletic organizations of Yale University to devise a plan by which the system of financial support of athletics may be improved issued a public letter this morning suggesting that, instead of giving indiscriminately for different athletic purposes, as at present, each student in the university who can afford it be assessed a small sum, probably between $5 and $10 each year. The amount of the assessment, the committee says, could be determined by making an estimate of the sum required yearly by all the different organizations and deducting from this the amount which may be reasonably expected to come from football and baseball games. Attention is called to the fact that under the present system the contributions are not sufficient for the support of athletics. The committee believes the plan suggested will remedy this.

Columbia's Basket Ball Schedule.

Manager Roi E. McGrue of the Columbia University basket ball team is gradually shaping the season's schedule of games. The roster will surely include contests with the University of Pennsylvania, Yale, Harvard, and Dartmouth, while games with Tufts, Wesleyan, Williams, and Rutgers are being considered. An effort is being made to make the Yale game a social as well as an athletic success. It is planned to have the contest take place early in January at the Knickerbocker Athletic Club. A game between the freshman team and some prominent preparatory school is being arranged for the same evening. After the contest a concert will be given by the Glee and Mandolin Clubs, and a dance will be held in the Knickerbocker Athletic Club's theatre. An effort was made to secure a trip up the Hudson for the holidays, but owing to the lateness of the organization of the team, the plan had to be abandoned.

C. C. N. Y. Athletic Meet.

An indoor meet will be held by the Athletic Association of the College of the City of New York on the evening of Jan. 6. In the arrangement of the programme the first events decided will be the handicaps open only to students of the college.

NEW YORK HOCKEY TEAM WON.

Princeton Seven Beaten by Three Goals at St. Nicholas Rink.

Three goals to none, in favor of New York, was the score in the hockey game played last night at St. Nicholas Rink between the Princeton University seven and the Hockey Club of New York. The college boys, though strong in defending their own goal, showed considerable lack of offensive work. As a result, the puck hovered about in the visitors' territory for the greater part of the game, and only once or twice approached dangerously near to the New Yorkers' goal, and when it did come within shooting distance the fine playing of Phillips between the posts brought to naught all attempts at a score.

The play started off rather slowly in the first half. The puck sailed back and forth in long flights from one end of the ice to the other, and there were none of the sharp, fierce scrimmages which characterize a fast game. Finally, after about four minutes of play, Huntington, defended by Leo, avoiding Pee and Alexander, rushed down the ice and sent the little black disk spinning between the flags. Score—New York, 1; Princeton, 0.

After this Princeton braced up and blocked all attempts at a score until Russell, the fast New York forward, by a series of brilliant rushes pushed the puck to within five yards of Princeton's goal, and then shot for an easy score. Play remained in Princeton's territory for the rest of the half, but no more scoring was made. The half ended with New York, 2; Princeton, 0.

In the second half, Princeton started in with a rush, determined to tally if possible. Three times the puck flew straight at the New York posts, but Phillips was there, and it did not pass between them. After a few minutes, however, the New Yorkers worked the play over the line into Princeton's territory and kept it there. Brown's play for the Tigers was magnificent. Six straight shots at his goal he blocked, but on the seventh he failed, and the disk, impelled by De Casanova's stick, slid by him for a score. In the remaining half minute of play no score was made, and the game ended with New York, 3; Princeton, 0. Line up:

Phillips	Goal	Brown
Cunningham	Point	H. Little
Curnan	Cover point	R. Little
De Casanova	Forward	Poe
Huntington	Forward	Alexander
Geo. Lockman	Forward	Purnell
Russell	Forward	McGalpin

Goals—Hockey Club of New York, Huntington, Russell, and De Casanova. Referee—Mr. Howard Walton. Time of halves—15 and 10 minutes.

MAKE-UP OF HOCKEY TEAMS.

Sevens in Coming Season's Championships Are Evenly Matched.

The first championship game of hockey this year will take place next Thursday, when the sevens of the New York Athletic Club and the Hockey Club of New York will meet in the St. Nicholas Rink. Now that the season's opening is so close at hand, those who follow the sport are beginning to estimate the various teams' chances for success this year. The factor which will figure most in the battle for supremacy is the number of veteran players from last year that each team will have.

The seven of the Crescent Athletic Club, which made the splendid record last season of ten games won and none lost will be very nearly unimpaired. Garvie, Drakely, McKenzie, Dobby, and Wall are to be in the game again, while Liffiton, a veteran of the Brooklyn Skating Club, will be one of the new men. The Crescents won the championship last year and are confident of doing so again.

The New York Athletic Club, which closely followed the Crescents last season, will retain the three clever forwards, Howard, Hornfeck, and Beiden, and will have undoubtedly the best primary defense in the league. With O'Donnell, Hunt, and Fenwick, the team feels that it can give the Crescents a closer and possibly a more successful struggle than last year.

The Hockey Club of New York, which began so well and finished so poorly, will with the exception of S. Phillips, have the same line-up as last season. The team, however, has apparently no very good chances of finishing prominently.

The St. Nicholas Skatink Club's seven, practically the only team composed entirely of American players, has the best members of last year's aggregation again, together with some good new men. Hayward, at goal; K. Gordon, and D. Gordon, and Walton, all forwards, and Livingston, at cover point, are playing. Shiras Campbell, Captain of Yale last year; "Crit" Ayres, the old Princeton full-back, and Wylie, an interscholastic player, are among the new men.

The Brooklyn Skating Club's seven, which practices with the Crescent team, has developed considerably in team play, and may continue the winning pace it set toward the end of last season.

The Naval Reserves, the rear guard of last season, are not in the league. Their place has been taken by the Quaker City Hockey Club of Philadelphia. George Orton, the old Pennsylvania runner, plays on the team and manages it. The seven, Orton says, includes a number of fast and expert Canadian players, but the definite line-up has not yet been decided. It is generally conceded that the team should finish among the leaders.

Columbia's Hockey Practice.

As the opening of the intercollegiate season approaches, Columbia's hockey players are getting down to the hardest sort of practice at the St. Nicholas Rink. Columbia's schedule is so arranged that all of her games will be played at this rink, so that the players will know their ground. The squad which began work with about forty players has been cut down nearly half, and now twenty-two men are trying for positions on the team. Thus far the work has been characterized by the same fault that appeared in last year's team—that is, lack of united defense and slow and inaccurate work on the part of the backs. Every effort, however, is being directed toward eliminating these shortcomings. The players who have been retained on the squad are as follows: E. W. Putnam, I. F. C. Ropes, E. J. Reid, F. M. Benedict, R. L. Von Bernuth, D. McKee, F. M. Becket, G. A. Lawrence, S. Brown, W. G. Lindsay, D. S. Hudson, C. E. Bartow, A. J. Akin, E. A. Akin, A. Wolff, C. E. Doggeshall, G. A. Olyphant, S. Campbell, H. W. George, F. K. Baxter, T. E. Duden, C. A. Dana, and G. E. Eyer.

SPORT ON THE SPEEDWAY.

Cold Weather Did Not Prevent Some Spirited Brushes Between Local Trotters and Pacers.

There were a number of good brushes on the Speedway yesterday afternoon before the biting north wind, that began to pick up the dust on the hard dry roadbed about 4 o'clock, drove the horsemen and their favorites homeward. Conspicuous among the gathering was the bay trotter Copeland, 2:09¼, driven by M. Spires. In several warming trots up and down the stretch the animal showed remarkable speed, and had just started in what promised to be a very lively brush when the wagon lost one of its tires, which prevented all further brushing.

The handsome little bay mare Rival, 2:17¼, was in fine form and speed, but was not quite fast enough for a very racy looking green mare driven by Myers. The race was one of the best of the afternoon, the first quarter being remarkably fast, the pair trotting side by side. After the first quarter post had been passed Rival took a lead of half a length, but was unable to hold it against a burst of speed shown by the green mare, who passed her opponent and crossed the finish line a half length in the lead. A. B. Gwynne was on the road with Tiverton, 2:23¼, and the mare Louise Mac, 2:09¼, to the pole. They made a very fast team, and showed the way home to several trotters and pacers who tried to come down the stretch with them.

David Lamar, driving the speedy little colt Royalto, and Jack Curry, driving Edward D. had several interesting heats, Edward D. won the first heat very handily, taking the lead in the stretch and holding it to the finish, where he crossed the line a winner by at least two open lengths. The second heat proved just the reverse, Royalto taking first place near the finish, and winning easily. The bay pacer Elsinora, 2:12¾, driven by John Hallihan, was in good form, and had several tilts with Fred W., driven by Charles Weiland, with honors about even. Among others on the road were George Coleman, driving Baby Bemeica, 2:26½; George Spear, driving the famous trotter Alice Barnes, 2:11½; H. Riley, driving Commodore Porter, and Charles Newman, behind a pair of bay pacers.

BOXING TO STOP IN CHICAGO.

Legislation Against the Game on Account of Gans-McGovern Fake Fight.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—The News to-day says: "Chicago's sporting fraternity is now convinced that the Gans-McGovern fight was one of the greatest fakes ever pulled off in this city. In connection with it William H. Arthur, Assistant Corporation Attorney, made public the following to-day:

"'Last Tuesday a man came to my office with $8,000 in greenbacks, which he offered to wager at 8 to 5 on McGovern. He was a colored gambler, and we questioned him. Finally he said there was an agreement out that Gans was to quit before the fifth round. This will be presented to the Council at its meeting Monday night, and it was said around the City Hall to-day that there was no doubt of its passage.

Improving Conditions Shown in Large Investment Purchases.

CHOICEST LOTS FIND BUYERS

Two investment purchases of valuable mercantile parcels within a week, several deals involving the finest class of unimproved property, as well as a goodly amount of business of the ordinary variety, appear to indicate that the revival of the last fortnight is of more than temporary character.

Following closely his sale of the building 122 and 124 Fifth Avenue, Henry Corn disposed of his recently completed structure at the southwest corner of Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth Street to Augustus D. Juilliard, and Charles A. Gould, who is by no means a newcomer in New York real estate, added to his holdings by the purchase of 830 Broadway from the Meia Realty Company.

The sale of the last of the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum property—the southeast corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-second Street—to Flake & Dowling is taken to mean the abandoning of the scheme to erect a gigantic apartment hotel on that property, which occasioned considerable alarm only two weeks ago. The proprietor of the apartment hotel allowed the option on the corner to expire, and it is believed that Messrs. Flake & Dowling, who already own a sixty-foot frontage near by on the south side of Fifty-second Street, will resell the corner plot in residence sites. In connection with this transaction it is interesting to note that the resale of the Orphan Asylum block by the syndicate has been accomplished just within a year—contracts for the purchase by Mr. Barney and his associates having been signed on Dec. 28, 1899.

Other dealings of the week in vacant property were notable in that they involved especially desirable parcels. One of the few remaining plots on Central Park West, the northwest corner of Seventy-fifth Street, was bought by David H. King, Jr. Builders Sauer, Gross & Herbener acquired the entire block front on the west side of Amsterdam Avenue, between Ninety-fourth and Ninety-fifth Streets, while at Lenox Avenue and One Hundred and Fifteenth Street the old Sherwood mansion property will soon be the site of a modern apartment house.

The Auction Room.

The successful sale of the Weil estate's holdings, 812 Broadway and 64 to 68½ Bowery, relieved an otherwise uninteresting week in the salesroom. The competition for both parcels was of the liveliest sort, and the price in each instance, if anything, surpassed expectations. The bid for 812 Broadway, $110,100, compares favorably with appraisals made before the sale, while, if current reports are correct as to the figure which the executors of the estate would have accepted for the Bowery property at private sale, they have every reason to be satisfied with Wednesday's auction price of $86,750.

Voluntary offerings of any importance are lacking in this week's list. Incidental to winding up the affairs of the Tradesmen's National Bank, the six-story structure known as the Florence Building, at the northeast corner of Second Avenue and First Street, on a plot 81 by 84, will be sold to-morrow. On Tuesday Richard V. Harnett & Co. will sell by executors' orders the plot, 51 by 128, running through from Third to Lincoln Avenue, just south of One Hundred and Thirty-sixth Street, and the flat at the northeast corner of Third Avenue and One Hundred and Forty-first Street. A partition offering announced by William M. Ryan for Friday includes 204 and 946 Seventh Avenue and 245 West Thirty-first Street.

There were recorded last week 301 mortgages, for $4,303,659, of which 96, for $1,085,275, were at 5 per cent.; 125, for $1,408,534, were at more, and 80, for $1,816,850, were at less. In the corresponding week last year there were recorded 289 mortgages, for $4,236,366, of which 93, for $1,265,835, were at 5 per cent.; 123, for $1,561,156, were at more, and 73, for $1,561,875, were at less.

BOSTON ICE DEAL A FACT.

Officers of the Company Admit that the Trust Has Acquired a Controlling Interest.

BOSTON, Dec. 15.—In the face of persistent rumors which have been in circulation here for several days, the officials of the Boston Ice Company, which controlled the bulk of the ice business in this city, today admitted that the American Ice Company of New Jersey has purchased a controlling interest in the Boston company. Details are withheld. The capital of the Boston Ice Company is $500,000.

The stories which have been heard for more than a month have given many alleged details of the deal, the price paid being placed as high as $2,000,000. President R. W. Hopkins will not admit the correctness of this statement. The apparent disinclination to discuss the matter is explained by the officers by the statement that the Boston Ice Company is a close corporation and the public is not interested in its doings.

The Boston Ice Company was organized soon after the civil war. From time to time various smaller concerns were absorbed, until the Boston Company controlled by far the greater part of the business in this city. In Summer 500 men are employed and 2,000 tons of ice a day are handled. The company has paid dividends as high as 30 per cent., although of late years the rate has not exceeded 10 per cent. The company has extensive icehouses in various parts of Massachusetts and New Hampshire.

It has been understood for the past two years in the ice trade of New England that the American Ice Company, which practically controls the ice business of the Atlantic Coast cities, save Boston, desired to obtain a foothold here, particularly in order to afford an advantageous outlet for its Maine ice, the company having bought up the majority of the icehouses on the Kennebec River two years ago. Each time negotiations were opened, however, the deal fell through, and about ten days ago, when the story reached Boston that the purchase had been made on Dec. 1, but would not be announced until Jan. 1, it was positively denied.

The rumor refused to down, however, and last night it was revived from the Maine ice district, controlled by the American Company. Then President Hopkins and Treasurer Bartlett of the Boston Company admitted that the controlling interest had been sold.

It is understood that the New Jersey corporation has been able to make very advantageous arrangements for rail transportation from Maine to Boston, and that negotiations already are in progress for it to obtain docking facilities here as well. Under the new deal the present officials of the Boston Ice Company will stay in charge of its business in this city.

STOLE HIS MOTHER'S HORSE.

Twice Before Strebel Took the Same Animal and Once Was Convicted.

Benjamin Strebel, alias Yackers, of Maspeth, L. I., was arraigned in the Lee Avenue Police Court, Brooklyn, yesterday, charged with grand larceny, and in default of $1,000 bail was committed to jail. The prisoner's mother, Mrs. Sophie Strebel, a florist in Maspeth, accuses him of stealing a horse valued at $150, the third time the animal has been stolen in eighteen months. Twice before Strebel sold the horse, and for the second offense his mother prosecuted him and he was sentenced to one year in the Kings County Penitentiary.

His time expired a few weeks ago, so Strebel went back to his home, where he was put to work in a greenhouse. Early yesterday morning he tried to sell the horse to Henry Meyer, a grocer at Rodney and South Fourth Streets and was arrested.

MR. BOUTELLE'S CONDITION.

Congressman's Physician Gives Out a Written Statement.

PORTLAND, Me., Dec. 15.—A special from Washington says:

"The exact condition of Congressman Charles A. Boutelle's health has been given in writing by Dr. Edward Cowles, Superintendent of the McLean Hospital, Waverley, Mass., in connection with the proposition to place him on the retired list of the navy. Dr. Cowles says:

"'Mr. Charles A. Boutelle has been a patient in this hospital since Dec. 27, 1899. His mental disturbance, disorder of speech, &c., are symptomatic of brain disease associated with chronic renal and cardiac lesions. There has been a decided improvement in the mental condition. The patient is intelligent in the expression of his own thoughts and in his understanding of those of other persons except for the remaining mental disturbance, which at times becomes aggravated.

"'The future progress of Mr. Boutelle's illness depends upon that of the renal and cardiac disease and further cerebral changes. At the present time the indications are not so favorable as formerly for a degree of recovery of which there has appeared reason for being hopeful; but his mental improvement is likely to continue, and he may be expected to become well enough to return to his own home. In my opinion, he should never resume the cares of active life, nor undertake any business responsibility, and he may live but a few years.'"

YOUNG WOMAN TRIES SUICIDE.

Despondent, She Blows Away Part of Her Skull with a Shotgun.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 15.—Miss Mary Curtis of Mayville, N. D., made a desperate attempt to end her life to-day at Jennings, La., and may die as the result of a self-inflicted wound. She has been in Jennings for some weeks. Recently she became despondent. Yesterday she secured a muzzle-loading shotgun, loaded it with powder and shot, and, standing it upright, placed her head over the muzzle and pulled the trigger. The charge tore away a portion of the skull, exposing the brain. She was not familiar with the quantity of powder required, and had not used sufficient to drive the shot through the skull.

By using a silver plate as large as a half dollar piece to close the wound, the doctors hope to save the girl's life.

THIEVES LOCK UP A MARSHAL.

Then Proceed to Blow Open Safes in an Illinois Town.

BRIGHTON, Ill., Dec. 15.—Five men, posing as tramps, were permitted to lodge in the lockup here last evening. During the night they overpowered the Town Marshal, locked him in a cell and broke into the private bank of Blodgett Brothers. Several charges of dynamite were exploded, but the vault, which contained a large sum, was only partly wrecked, and the men gave up trying to secure it. The general store of Edward Butler was next visited. Here the safe was blown open and several hundred dollars secured.

The men were entering another store when an alarm of fire was sounded from Butler's. In the meantime the robbers escaped. A posse, with bloodhounds, is in pursuit.

WANTS ARREARS OF ALIMONY.

Mrs. Steinebach Accused Her ex-Husband of Contempt of Court.

Mrs. Mary W. Steinebach, who on April 26, 1899, secured a decree of separation from her husband, Ferdinand F. Steinebach, on the ground of his desertion of her, applied to Justice Leventritt, in the Supreme Court, yesterday for an order adjudging him guilty of contempt of court for his failure to pay her $384 arrears of temporary alimony, which had fallen due before she got her decree. Steinebach asked that the order awarding temporary alimony to his wife be modified, as he was unable to pay it.

Mrs Steinebach, when she commenced her suit, was allowed $18 a week alimony. Her husband was at that time a member of the firm of Plock, Steinebach & Murray, marble workers, which afterward went out of business on account of financial difficulties.

Steinebach was adjudged in contempt and sent to jail for non-payment of the $18 a week, but was released after four days, and the alimony reduced to $15 a week. When she got her decree $12 a week permanent alimony for herself and her three children was awarded to Mrs. Steinebach.

Mrs. Steinebach claimed that her husband was well able to pay the arrears of alimony, and was now carrying on the marble business, but on the pretense that he had sold it to his sisters for money loaned by them.

Justice Leventritt declined to make an order modifying the amount of alimony to be paid by Steinebach, but said he would not punish him for contempt unless, after examination of the affidavits, he found he was in a position to pay.

Thousands of Toys in a Wonderful Toy Store.

The whole fourth floor of the West Building wasn't big enough, so it spread out into the Central Building, the biggest, jolliest, busiest Toy Store that ever was. There is "Doll Row"—a regular street where the Dolls—hundreds and hundreds of them—live, where the dolls' houses and furniture and clothes and everything that goes to make dolls and girls happy may be found.

There are the mechanical Toys that "really, truly" work and the animals that call, even a big tigress with cubs who roars when any one goes near enough to pull a string in her neck. There are the games and the wagons and sleds and skates, and there is the Santa Claus play, too—performances every five minutes or so. The most Toys and the most different kinds of Toys and

Men's Oxford Overcoats, $13.50

Regularly $18 and $20.

Still enough of these splendid Coats to tell about—though we can't promise after to-day.

Materials are undressed worsted coatings in plain and rough effects and in the dark Oxford colorings that are hard to get in Coats for a little price. These are not usual little priced Coats—that's the reason. Cut is the half box style, medium length; lining Princess or Victoria serge; the sleeves of all and the shoulders of some lined with satin.

The Season's Opportunity at $13.50.

Second floor, rear, East Building.

Materials are the freshest of the season's patterns, all worthy, smart fabrics. Two bargain offers, in fact.

The Overcoats will be made of high grade cheviots, vicunas, meltons and kerseys, in all the fashionable colorings and weaves, and in fit, style and finish they will have the general effect of the best of custom made garments. The lining will be a heavy satin that will give satisfactory wear.

The Suits will be made of Rock Mills cheviots and cassimeres in checks, plaids, stripes and overplaids that are bright, new and handsome. Made in either sack, cutaway or English walking coat style and guaranteed to suit you.

INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF INSANE PATIENT

Three Bellevue Nurses Who Had Charge of Hilliard Suspended.

STRANGLED, DR. DONLON SAYS

Three of His Ribs and the Hyoid Bone Broken—A Violent Patient, Superintendent O'Rourke Says.

The death of Louis H. Hilliard, the Bellevue insane patient who, according to Coroners' Physician Donlon, was strangled on Tuesday by three Bellevue nurses, was investigated yesterday by Commissioner of Charities John W. Keller in person. In consequence, the Commissioner discharged T. R. Davis, Edward Dean, and Charles Marshall, the three nurses employed in the insane pavilion who were with Hilliard when he died. Later the Commissioner rescinded the discharge order and suspended the men pending an investigation, to be held to-morrow at 11 o'clock in his office.

Hilliard was the patient whose body was taken from the insane pavilion to the Morgue on Tuesday night. The man died in a fit of violence, it was reported, while struggling with the nurses. Dr. Moore, the physician in charge of the pavilion, reported the circumstances to Coroners' Physician Donlon, who made an autopsy, which showed that three of the man's left ribs had been broken—one of them directly over the heart—and also that the hyoid bone, or "Adam's apple," had been broken, indicating that the man had been strangled.

Superintendent O'Rourke of the hospital said yesterday that he had caused an investigation of the supposed assault, and had submitted his report to Commissioner Keller. Mr. O'Rourke said that, besides the principal injuries which Dr. Donlon had discovered, he had also found a number of bruises on the man's body. The Superintendent said that the record book of the insane pavilion shows that when Hilliard was received he had a contusion over the right eye, an abrasion of the left shoulder, chest, and both legs. No mention regarding the broken ribs and the broken hyoid bone appears on the record. Mr. O'Rourke said also that, as all patients when admitted are subjected to a careful examination, the nurses must explain how Hilliard came by the injuries which caused his death while under their charge.

The statements of the three nurses and Dr. Moore, which were made to Mr. O'Rourke and were forwarded by him to Mr. Keller, all say that on the night of Nov. 12 Hilliard refused to eat anything and started in to attack the nurses and all about him. An effort was made to subdue him, but that was found impossible. The nurses then tried to force him into a straitjacket, but could not. He fought the nurses to a standstill. They finally decided to let him do what he pleased so as to tire him out. For nearly ten minutes he writhed and twisted on the floor like a gymnast trying to do contortions. Then he jumped to his feet, but fell to the floor again, lying perfectly still.

The nurses examined the body and found the man had ceased to breathe. Dr. Moore was hastily summoned, and injections of strychnine and atrophine and whisky were administered. The man did not respond to this treatment, and artificial respiration was resorted to without avail. He steadily sank and expired.

Commissioner Keller said: "It is no easy matter to clear up, for you must remember the witnesses to the affair are all persons of more or less ill-balanced minds. I don't believe these nurses intentionally mistreated this man, but there is no doubt in my mind that he died because of the treatment he received from the nurses in their attempt to subdue him. From this hour, hereafter no patient shall be struck by any of the nurses for any cause whatever. For a nurse to strike a patient will be equivalent to a discharge."

The Commissioner wished to examine the nurses at once, but found they had been summoned by the Coroner. When asked how the hearing would be conducted to-morrow, Mr. Keller said:

"I wish to determine the exact condition of the man at the time he was brought to the hospital and whether or not the hyoid bone in the throat and the ribs were broken. The history book at the hospital is a little bit uncertain and unsatisfactory on this point. If the nurses fail to satisfy me that no more force than necessary was used to subdue the man, they will be discharged."

Superintendent O'Rourke said: "The three men, Davis, Dean, and Marshall, were nurses who bore excellent records with us. All three were strapping big fellows, very powerful, and were especially picked for the work among the insane, because they were fitted to cope, if necessary, with any violent madman. The work in that department is frequently dangerous. The patients possess all the cunning of wild animals, and when in one of their tantrums are as ferocious and as powerful as only a madman can become. Under such circumstances it frequently happens that when a patient breaks out it means simply a hand-to-hand encounter. When a full investigation is made we may find that the nurses were after all not responsible for the injuries. It is simply a case of 'suspending judgment' until more is known."

Hilliard was forty-one years old and lived at 301 Seventh Avenue. On Monday he walked into the Old Slip Police Station and shouted that he was worth millions of dollars and that he had unlimited money in France. He was sent in a Gouverneur Hospital ambulance, in charge of a policeman and Surgeon Rosensohn, to Bellevue Hospital. Here he was put into the insane pavilion. It was impossible to examine him carefully, as he fought the doctors and nurses. He led out with both fists and more than one of the nurses was knocked down by his blows. That was twenty-five hours before he died."

Dr. Donlon said that in his opinion Hilliard had been smothered. The breaking of the hyoid bone would, under circumstances, be enough to cause strangulation.

Coroner Fitzpatrick, who has the case in hand, said that an inquest would be held and an investigation made the day of the inquest to be determined upon shortly. He said that no arrests had been made. Superintendent O'Rourke has been asked to prepare a report of an investigation to be submitted to the Coroner.

Hilliard's wife called at the Morgue yesterday morning and had her husband's body removed to her home.

LEGAL NOTES.

QUESTION OF NEGLIGENCE.—Mrs. Louisa C. Pursley recovered judgment for $4,000 in her suit, as administratrix, against the Edgemoor Bridge Works, for damages for the death of her husband, Charles S. Pursley, who was killed in April last year by the collapse of a scaffold structure which measured over fifty feet high, erected in the Harlem River. The deceased was in the employ of the defendant, and it was claimed that it had negligently failed to provide a safe and suitable place for him to work. The case turned upon whether the method of construction adopted in the erection of the scaffold was reasonably safe. The Edgemoor Bridge Works were under contract to erect a steel bridge across the Harlem River, and stone piers were built, between which temporary scaffolds were constructed, intended to support the steel girders. On the top of longitudinal timbers, or stringers, tracks were placed, on which ran a traveler, or crane, weighing thirty tons, which was used for hoisting timbers from below. Mr. Pursley, who had some experience in bridge and scaffold building, was at the time at work in a boat below the traveler. It was sought by the company to explain the accident by showing that just before some workmen had drawn bolts from the stringers, thus breaking the chain of beams which reached back to the bulkhead. On the other side, it was claimed the proximate cause of the accident was faulty construction of the scaffold, because the piles were not properly driven. Justice O'Brien, giving the opinion of the Court, Presiding Justice Van Brunt and and Justice Hatch concurring, comes to the conclusion, upon an exhaustive consideration of the case, that there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury the question of defendant's negligence, and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence, and that the judgment should be affirmed. Justice Ingraham gave a dissenting opinion, saying it was by the negligence of other employes of the defendant, who were decedent's fellow-workmen, that the traveler was placed upon a portion of the structure not sufficiently braced, and in consequence of that negligence the structure gave way and Pursley was killed. Because it thus was negligence of a fellow-servant, and not of the master, the defendant could not be held liable. Justice McLaughlin held there should be a reversal because of the improper admission of evidence, in that a witness was allowed to say that the structure was not properly built, and that the scaffold was not safe. These, Justice McLaughlin said, were questions which must be determined from the facts, and not from the conclusion of a witness, no matter how learned or skilled he might be in the construction of scaffolds.

MRS. DANIELS AND HER LAWYERS.—William B. Daniels died pending a suit brought against him by Lilyon B. Daniels, in Arapahoe County, Col., to annul a divorce decree which she said he had obtained against her by fraud. Then, in 1891, she sued W. C. Daniels, son and principal legatee, and also trustee of her husband's estate, in a Federal Court, in Colorado, claiming one-half of his estate of $2,000,000, as his surviving widow. She made an agreement with Hatch & Warren, as her lawyers, whereby they were to prosecute the suit and defray all expenses, and she assigned 30 per cent. of her claims to the firm, which claims they had authority to compromise. Hatch & Warren then arranged with Thomas Nelson, whereby the latter was to share in their contract with Mrs. Daniels. Mrs. Nelson agreed to pay certain sums to enable Hatch & Warren to carry it out, and he advanced $7,000 up to October, 1891. Soon after Hatch & Warren wrote to Nelson requiring another payment, within a month. Mr. Nelson was afterward informed by Mr. Warren that the money was not needed. Subsequently Hatch & Warren wrote to Nelson that because of his failure to pay $1,000 more, the agreement was void. The claim of Mrs. Daniels against her husband's estate was never prosecuted to judgment. Mrs. Daniels was informed in September, 1892, that the firm of Hatch & Warren had been dissolved, and that the provisions of the contract with her had terminated. A suit brought by Mr. Nelson, in the Supreme Court, in this city, to recover back the moneys he had paid to Edward S. Hatch and Lyman E. Warren, was tried before a referee, who dismissed the complaint. The Appellate Division, in an opinion by Justice Hatch, has reversed the judgment, saying the referee had misconceived the character of the action. Instead of being an equitable action to rescind the contract, it was an action at law to recover damages for breach of the contract. As to the claim of Mr. Hatch that the abandonment of the contract with Mrs. Daniels was in pursuance of a scheme on the part of Mr. Warren and others to deprive him of the benefits to be derived from it, the Court says the redress for that, if any exists, must be against the parties who worked the wrong.

CLOSING OF MORRIS AVENUE.—When proceedings were instituted on behalf of the city recently for opening a new street, called Morris Avenue, from Tremont Avenue to Park View Terrace, Theodore Sattler and others, who owned lots upon the old Morris or Monroe Avenue, which for many years had been open as a public street, petitioned to the Supreme Court, under the laws of 1895, asking that the Commissioners of Appraisal and Estimate, appointed in the proceedings, be directed to determine the compensation which should be made to them for loss or damage sustained by the discontinuance or closing of the old Morris Avenue, upon which their property abutted. The decision below, refusing the application, has just been reversed by the Appellate Division. The former Morris Avenue, though long used as a street, had not been opened under any proceedings instituted by the city. The Court holds, by Justice Ingraham, that the filing of the map of the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Wards by the municipal authorities, under the act of 1890, discontinued the old street, and that the owners of the abutting property on that street were, under the act of 1895, entitled to compensation from the city for the injuries sustained in consequence. Presiding Justice Van Brunt dissented.

Seeks a Larger Allowance.

A motion by Lawyer Lehman, as counsel for Mrs. Julia M. Mollenhauer, for an increase of allowance pending the action for divorce brought against her by her husband, John W. Mollenhauer, son of the head of the Mollenhauer Sugar Refining Company, was argued yesterday before Justice Maddux in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn. In September last Justice Herrick allowed Mrs. Mollenhauer $10 a week alimony. Her counsel claimed yesterday that since that time Mrs. Mollenhauer's circumstances had undergone a change, and that she could not get along on only $10 a week. Ex-District Attorney James W. Ridgway opposed the motion.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT CORNERSTONE LAID

Gov. Roosevelt Officiates at the Riverside Park Ceremony.

ADDRESS BY GEN. A. D. SHAW

Volunteers, He Says, Founded the Nation, Under Washington, and Preserved It, Under Lincoln.

"We've nothing but a memory to warm us."

The speaker, referring to the rather frigid climatic conditions at Riverside Drive and Eighty-ninth Street yesterday, where the ceremony of laying the cornerstone of the Soldiers and Sailors' Monument was about to begin, wore no uniform.

An old man in faded blue standing beside him turned quickly: "I don't believe you're a veteran," he said. "Nothing but a memory, indeed! Look at this," pointing to the tattered flag he was holding, "and that." His finger was directed toward the point where the shaft erected to "the man of peace" broke the horizon line.

A cannon roared a salute, and on a tall flagstaff that had been reared a little to the south of the monument site the Stars and Stripes were run up, fluttering in the breeze. That marked the beginning of the ceremony, which took place in a spot where everything united for picturesqueness. And when Bishop Farley began the prayer, the bared heads of more than 1,000 Grand Army of the Republic veterans, the women and school children bowed in silence, made a spectacle of unusual solemnity and impressiveness. At the conclusion of the prayer the band of the New York Catholic Protectorate struck up "Yankee Doodle," and cheer after cheer went up.

The oration of the day was delivered by Gen. Albert D. Shaw, who said that the American Revolution was an epoch of National formation, and the struggle of the sixties marked a second and even more perilous era of National preservation. In both, he said, volunteers were the heroes of the hour. History, he said, will make clear the fact that the volunteers under Washington founded our Nation, and the volunteers under Lincoln preserved and perpetuated it, and that they are the proudest product of all the ages.

"I have placed our volunteers," continued Gen. Shaw, "both of the Revolution and of the rebellion, first in the honor line, as is right and just, but back of both periods stood the loyal masses of our countrymen and our countrywomen, an impregnable reserve, doing the no less useful and equally as important duty of sustaining the armies in the field and the families at home, with a devotion that stamps them as worthy compatriots in the best work of the ages.

"The monuments we raise to our Union heroes are not memorials of conquest, but signify the Nation's appreciation of the victors who saved it in the supreme crisis of its fate. Those who matched our valor on every battlefield of the war did so with a courage as true and a heroism as pure as our own. They faced death for a cause they held dear, and died like brave men in the defense of what they believed to be their precious rights. That they were sadly wrong is the world's judgment, but at the same time, as soldiers they won the admiration of friend and foe. We are all American citizens now, and juster judgments have followed the lapse of years."

Gen. Shaw paid tributes to the memory of Lincoln and Grant, which were received with prolonged cheers, and concluded with an appeal to all to prove worthy of the civilization the soldiers and sailors have preserved to us.

A chorus of school children sang "Columbia" and "Tenting To-night," many of the veterans joining in the refrains.

Gov. Roosevelt, who was present to lay the cornerstone, after the cheers his appearance evoked had subsided, said, in part:

"I am glad to have the chance to say a word or two, especially since I see here these school children, the representation of the next generation, which will do its work well or ill as it does or does not follow the standard the soldiers of the Republic have set.

"Any one who has ever carried arms for a great idea must ever after have the capacity for higher things—those that make for real greatness in our National life. You, I am sure, will respond gladly to any appeal in time of peace or war. Honor to volunteers and regulars alike, to those who fought on sea and land.

"Now let us, the younger generation, pay to the heroes the homage of trying to emulate their deeds, by so shaping the life of this Nation that it may be seen that their sacrifices were not in vain."

Then Gov. Roosevelt placed his hand upon the cornerstone, the creaking of a windlass began, and the stone was lowered into place. The Governor smoothed the first layer of cement that gave the cornerstone of the Sailors and Soldiers' Monument a permanent place.

The monument was designed by Charles W. and Arthur A. Stoughton and Peter E. Dubov. It will be of white marble, eighty feet in height and eighty feet above the level of the river. It will cost $250,000 and will commemorate the part taken by the soldiers and sailors who went from this city and lost their lives in the army and the navy.

NEW BRIDGE'S BIG CABLES.

Work of Sketching Them Soon to Begin—Last Saddle for the Structure in Place.

The last saddle for the new East River Bridge was placed in position yesterday on the Williamsburg side, and the work in laying the cables will be begun in a short time. The Roebling Company of Manhattan has the contract for this work. Footbridges will be constructed, so that it may be carried on rapidly.

According to the Chief Engineer of the Roebling Company, there will be four cables, nineteen inches in diameter, each containing 10,000 wires. The weight of the cables alone will be about 4,500 tons. When they are made they will be divided into 37 strands containing 282 wires. It is the intention of the company to lay the four cables at one time, stringing the wire back and forth from each side of the river. Eighth strands will be made simultaneously. The wires will be paralleled and will be adjusted to the original guide wire. As soon as 282 wires have been taken across the river and adjusted, they will be tied together in a bundle, which is called a strand, and which will be in a higher position than it will finally occupy. The strands will have an open eye or loop at the end, which will go around a casting called a cable shoe. Each shoe rests against a temporary link about three or four feet back from the permanent pin in the base. Powerful apparatus will be necessary to lift it from the temporary rollers on top of the saddle into the saddle. This work will be necessary for each of the thirty-seven strands. When the strands are all completed they will be formed into a cylindrical cable by large steel clamps, which serve also to hold the suspenders which connect the floor system to the cables. This operation of adjustment will be performed from temporary footbridges.

LAKE ROUTE TO MONTREAL.

Lloyds' Representative Says the Waterway Is In Some Places Less than Fourteen Feet Deep.

Special to The New York Times.

OTTAWA, Dec. 14.—A Buffalo syndicate was organized over a year ago to build elevators in Montreal and to run a line of steamers between that port and the great lakes for the purpose of conveying grain to the seaboard. W. J. Connors of Buffalo and some of his associates were here during the week seeing the members of the Government in regard to this matter.

It appears that when the syndicate entered into its contract with the Government they were assured of a fourteen-foot waterway all the way from the lakes to Montreal. As the canals were constructed to this depth, and were only being finished, there was evidently no doubt upon that point. Indeed, no one seemed to question it, since it would have been utter folly to deepen the canals from twelve to fourteen feet if this depth did not prevail in the river portions.

It now turns out, or at least it is asserted by certain parties who are supposed to have some knowledge whereof they speak, that there are several points in the river below Prescott and elsewhere that will not permit a vessel drawing more than twelve feet to pass through. Letters have been written to the department in Ottawa calling attention to this, and stating that vessels drawing more than twelve feet had to lighten before they could get to Montreal.

Capt. W. J. Donnelly of Kingston, a representative of Lloyds, writes that there are not fourteen feet navigation in the river. He says that at different points there are great shoals of rock in the bed of the river, over which vessels have to pass, and where it is impossible to get even twelve feet of water. This, therefore, being the case, the Buffalo syndicate asserts that it is no use for its placing a fleet of steamers on the river and lake when fourteen feet cannot be obtained. Their agreement calls for a fourteen-foot waterway from the Government, and capitalists would not be induced to put any money into the scheme if this was not the case. Indeed, the capitalists whom they intended approaching in regard to the matter have already been advised that there is no such depth, and consequently refuse to put up the money.

An extra foot for navigation purposes means a great deal. In this case it practically means that with it a company might be formed to cope successfully with the existing routes from Buffalo to the seaboard, while without it it would be impossible to do so. For years there have been twelve-foot waterways, and the reason for increasing the depth to fourteen feet was to attract more of the traffic which was finding an outlet by Buffalo and the American seaports to the Old World. The history of all this is too well known to require any recapitulation here; it is enough to say that after the expenditure of millions of money and years of hard work in deepening the canals, which was first commenced twenty-five years ago by the late Sir Alexander Mackenzie, it has now been discovered that Canada is not much further ahead in its project for diverting the grain trade of the West by the St. Lawrence waterways than it was in the first instance, because the river beds will not permit of more than twelve feet draught, and some assert that even that cannot be had at certain points between Prescott and the City of Montreal.

When this condition of affairs was brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways, A. G. Blair, by the members of the Buffalo syndicate, he was in no mood to believe them. Still, they produced what appeared to be credible evidence. He assured them that when he started pushing through the work of deepening the canals, after being appointed to office in 1896, he was told by the Chief Engineer of Canals, Collingwood Schreiber, that the necessary depth of water was in the river. He had no knowledge of the facts himself, but he was satisfied that the officials of his department knew, or ought to know, what they were talking about. Mr. Schreiber was sent for by Mr. Blair, and, it is said, asserted in the presence of the Minister that there were fourteen feet navigation all the way from the great lakes to Montreal, and upon that point he was perfectly satisfied, no matter what any one else might say or assert to the contrary. He went on to say that he had all the facts before him, that he had personally visited many times all the points referred to, and was certain that those who had stated otherwise were grossly mistaken.

Mr. Blair was placed therefore in a rather difficult position. His chief engineer, and a man who has been in the department for a quarter of a century or more, insisted that everything was all right and as stated by him in the first instance—namely, that there were fourteen-foot waterways throughout; on the other hand, experienced navigators deny that there was, producing what appeared to be good evidence that what they said was correct. After looking into the whole matter fully Mr. Blair has decided to have a steamer loaded at Port Arthur next Spring, when navigation opens, drawing fourteen feet of water, and to have it run through to Montreal without moving any of the cargo. If the steamer succeeds in reaching there all right then it will be shown that there is sufficient water in the river, and if not it will be high time that the Department of Railways had a new Chief Engineer of Canals.

BRYAN TO BE AN EDITOR.

Nebraskan Will Establish a Weekly Paper to "Keep in Touch with Social and Political Problems."

LINCOLN, Neb., Dec. 15.—In announcing his plans for the future, W. J. Bryan makes the following statement: "I have for several years had in contemplation the establishment of a weekly newspaper, and this seems an opportune time for undertaking it.

"Intending to devote my life to the study and discussion of public questions, I have chosen this method because it will best accomplish the purposes which I have in view. Through such a paper I shall be able to keep in touch with social and political problems. The paper will, at the same time, if successful, provide an income sufficient for my pecuniary needs, and this kind of work will allow me more time with my family than I have been able to enjoy for several years past.

"I expect to lecture occasionally, especially in college towns, where I can speak to students, but my principal work will be done with the pen, or perhaps I should say, with the pencil.

"The paper will be called The Commoner, and will defend the principles set forth in the Kansas City platform. The first issue will appear in January. I shall be proprietor and editor."

Genuine Imported

Terra Cotta Figures

at 50c. On the Dollar.

We have just consummated with one of the largest importing houses in this city the purchase of their stock of genuine Terra Cotta figures, busts, groups, &c. We wish to particularly emphasize the fact that these figures are the genuine imported Terra Cotta, and not the imitation which is made in this country. Careful comparison will at once show the superiority in modelling, coloring, &c., of these figures to the less expensive ones, which are nothing more than a very poor imitation. It is particularly fortunate that we were able to buy these figures just at the height of the holiday season and at the special price of 50C. ON THE DOLLAR. Rather than keep these goods and sell them at the regular price, we have decided to turn the entire lot over immediately, and offer them to you at exactly ONE-HALF THE REAL VALUE. There are in all nearly 100 pieces, from the small pieces a few inches high to the large, magnificent groups of two and three figures. We simply mention a few of the different subjects, giving size, slight description and price. For decoration there is nothing more desirable than these figures.

EMPRESS DOWAGER'S MANY PERPLEXITIES

Area of Chinese Troubles Shown by Comparison with America.

Peking May Yet Prove the Safest Place for the Court—Russia and Manchuria.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

PEKING, Oct. 23.—The Empress Dowager is a firm believer in the first law of nature. Much as she says she would like to return to Peking, and grievous as have been the hardships of absence, she intends to feel assured of her personal safety, if not of the recognition of her sovereignty and of its continuance, before trusting herself within foreign lines. Since the Emperor is still subject to her will, he may be expected to say "Me, too," to anything she proposes.

Imperial presence, while lending to negotiations possible added importance, really promises more benefit to the Chinese than to the foreigners. Demands may be made and met quite as readily by the negotiations with the imperial family away as at Peking. Royalty itself could not participate in the conferences. On the other hand, if those in authority were within easy reach, the spectacle of helplessness thereby presented would exercise undoubted influence toward leniency on the part of the powers. The disposition to make terms of some kind with somebody, inspired though it may be by the distrust of each other by European Governments, and checked and vexed as it has been by the conduct of the imperial household and the German military policy, has lost nothing by delay. It certainly seems stronger than before in some respects, for while excuses are not sought for the connivance of the Empress Dowager at anti-foreign outrages, events have piled upon her uneasy mind such a load of troubles as to make her almost an object of pity.

THE POWERS' ENCROACHMENTS.

There is enough similarity in the configuration of China and the United States to make possible by comparison a territorial outline of affairs that has given and may well give the Empress Dowager grave concern. If Maine were to dip southward at Bar Harbor and carry a coast line due south for 150 miles, the peninsula thus formed would resemble Shen-King, the district of Manchuria which the Russians possess. Port Arthur and Talien-Wan are at the southern tip of the peninsula. With reference to the United States, their location corresponds to one about opposite Portsmouth, N. H. The peninsula incloses the Gulf of Pe-chi-li. When the Russians got this coast advantage, the British acquired Wei-hai-Wei, which corresponds to Provincetown on Cape Cod. Lately the British have taken possession of Shan-hai-Kwan, whose location is like that of Portland, Me. As the peninsula coast abounds in reefs, the Russians can make no important demonstration except by going out into the gulf within hailing distance of Wei-hai-Wei, and at the north British eyes are also on them at Shan-hai-Kwan. The German station of Kiao-Chow may be said to be at New Bedford, quite handy for a sortie against any power with serious designs in these waters.

When Port Arthur, Wei-hai-Wei, and Kiao-Chow passed under foreign lease, the Empress Dowager had virtually permitted Europe to put spies at her own door. Taku is situated like Boston, Tien-Tsin like Worcester, Pao-Ting like Albany, and Pao-Ting-Foo like Hartford. If there were an island skirting the coasts of the two Carolinas it would be like Formosa, which Japan now owns. Great Britain already had an island in what corresponds to Savannah Harbor in Hong-kong. When the northern leases were exacted France got Hai-Nan, which lies relatively as Cuba would if moved within the Gulf of Mexico, and, as France was in virtual control of territory corresponding to the Gulf States west of Florida, and including Texas and Arkansas, the choice parts of the empire were fairly well preempted.

With so much gone, indeed, the Empress read all trade signs in the Yang-tse Valley as indications that this section, too, the very heart of China, was in danger of foreign domination. The Yang-tse may be compared to Chesapeake Bay, and Shanghai, on a branch river, to Washington. Westward therefrom for 1,700 miles, and covering a region averaging quite 300 miles in width, foreign commercial enterprise, reaching eagerly out, impressed her as a clutch for her most lucrative possessions.

This territorial condition and the forebodings it excited furnished the basis for the comprehensive plan, intimated at Court, for getting rid of all foreigners in China. Help might have been expected in about every one of the eighteen provinces if the scheme had received time to ripen, for the foreigner has always been hated where he is least seen or known, namely, throughout the interior and western provinces, which embrace a territory as large as the Mississippi Valley. Manchuria, corresponding to Maine, Upper Canada, and Nova Scotia, would gladly have joined in such a crusade, as a check to the encroachments of Russia, and Mongolia, a region like Canada and British Columbia, and inhabited by drovers and herders, was quite Chinese enough in its character and anti-Russian enough from its experiences to lend willingly such help as might be needed in that quarter.

SMALL AREA OF HOSTILITIES.

When the Boxers spoiled the great game in hand, it was in a territory not much larger than New England. Actual hostilities have covered a much smaller area, resistance having been offered practically nowhere except along the line of a trifle more than 100 miles from Taku to this city. The excursions by foreign forces from Tien-Tsin and this city are as if hostile troops or ships had skirted the coast from Boston to Portland, meeting only scant resistance at the Pei-Tang forts, (at Marblehead); had run down to Tulu, (Fall River,) destroying that unresisting town; and had applied the torch to various settlements from Albany to Hartford and from Worcester to Hartford, representing the expeditions from Tien-Tsin and from this city to Poa-Ting-Foo.

In going to Sian-Foo, the imperial family has made a journey that may be compared to one from Albany to Pittsburg or Cincinnati. The Boxer and Mohammedan troops who went along as escort levied upon the entire route for their support, and, in addition to taking what they needed for maintenance, they helped themselves to loot as despoilers. An enemy could not have treated the country or people much worse.

So scandalous was the behavior of the troops that as far back as August men from the rear column came back here, having deserted because the front column had stripped the country of all there was to eat. Later on the Boxer escort, proving such a terror to the inhabitants along the way that they threatened resistance, is said to have been ordered out of the imperial column by the Empress Dowager and to have been diverting itself since then in the north wherever pillage might be gathered.

The Court's flight thus threw into dismay a populous region, hitherto peaceful and prosperous. Many of the inhabitants who ran away on account of raids of troops are now clamoring for their right to return and enjoy their own. The Empress could take of these nothing that they so much desire as her leave, and the din of that demand is sounded eternally into her distracted ears. Since Sian-Foo is safe from foreign invasion, the report that she contemplates moving down into Sze-Chuen Province—like moving from Cincinnati to Memphis—means that she has become alarmed over the confusion into which her troops have thrown her own people. She is much better protected from invasion where she is than would be at Cheng-Tu, Sze-Chuen, for there she would approach the territory of French encroachment. The French have gone ahead without European interference. When the account is made up, it will be found that Indo-Chine, as the French designate their possessions, includes about as extensive and as promising a slice of China as any foreign power either controls or covets.

ADROIT RUSSIAN DIPLOMACY.

It may be that the imperial authorities love and trust the Russians. Certainly Russian diplomacy has been most adroit. Professing to wish to further the work of peace, it has left to other powers the idle but probably necessary task of guarding this deserted city, in order to strengthen its hold in Manchurian territory. Nominally Russia has in Northeast China only a bit of reef-bound peninsula, but if any other power were to move in that direction, it would find a land corresponding to Maine, Upper Canada, and Nova Scotia garrisoned and perhaps defended against all comers, by Russia. The natives in that section have destroyed Russian railroad property, believing that if the railroad were completed the entire section would go with it.

That is the meaning of the Manchu uprisings—a protest in force against the absorption of a vast territory by a foreign power. The fact that Russia is an ambitious nation, and that it may need Manchuria, has not appealed nor does it appeal with favor to a people from whom the present dynasty sprung, and whose influence is still so powerful that it shares equally with all the provinces of China proper combined the direction of public affairs. If the imperial mind is at ease about Russia and accepts without reserve the bland professions from that quarter, the Czar is to be congratulated on the exalted character of his Foreign Office.

This city may yet be found the safest refuge for the Court. Coquette as the Empress Dowager may with the invitations to return here, and convinced as she must be that by so doing she will place herself in foreign control, if she yet chooses that course it will be through fear of her own people greater than that in which she holds the enemy.

Her New England is held by strangers; her Middle States are terrorized and in disorder; her Gulf States have suffered an invasion which, if peaceful, seems firm and permanent. Through the Canton district there are riots, culminating in an explosion at the Vicegegal residence, intended to cut off that official's career. Canton is located like Augusta. The region northward has become so rabidly anti-foreign that the missionaries and some of the merchants have fled to Shanghai, where fresh foreign troops have lately been landed and a foreign fleet guards the water approaches. All through the section corresponding to Virginia, Tennessee, Upper Alabama, and Mississippi, and Lower Missouri and Kansas unrest and apprehension prevail.

FREDERICK W. EDDY.

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Expatriated Misanthropist, Doubtful of His Country's Destiny, Cured When He Views Its Starry Folds.

A middle-aged New Yorker, who had been in poor luck, poor spirits, and poor health for some time, fell so far into the dumps that he could not be pulled out. He became a misanthropist, a pessimist, and a croaker. He soured on everything. He thought the world was as bad as it could be. He got to dislike even his own country, until he disliked it very grossly. He believed that it was going to pot. He denounced the Government as corrupt, the President as a sham, the officeholders as a pack of rascals, Congress as a chatterbox, and the old Republic as played out. His dislike of everything in his native land grew so strong at last that he could not bear the sight of its flag; got angry when an organ grinder played "Yankee Doodle," and declared that, if the American Navy were to salute him he would shoot it on the spot. There wasn't a shred of patriotism anywhere about him. He even went so far once as to say that George Washington had been cracked up more than he deserved.

His illness became so threatening that the doctor told him he must take a sea voyage, forget all about his own blighted country, and spend a few months abroad on the Riviera, where, in the genial airs of the Mediterranean, he might get straightened out.

So he got across the ocean and was taken to Nice, where his abode was at a big French hotel. He soon found that the place was uncomfortable, that French ways were unfamiliar to him, that French edibles and potables did not suit him, that the French servants were greedy, that the French hotel keeper was exacting, and that the French doctor did not seem to understand his case. He felt that he was in a foreign land, very foreign and lonesome to him. It was too "French," by half.

He had lain ill there for about a couple of months, still unreconciled to his own forsaken country, when one day something happened. He heard the boom of cannon. He sprang from his couch. He was told that a great warship of the American Navy had arrived at Villefranche.

"Americaine?" he asked eagerly.

"Oui, Monsieur!"

He was thrilled by the news; his pulse beat more rapidly; he could not help it. Thoughts of his far-off native land came into his desolate and foreign life. He seemed to be transformed.

Next day he was out. Hark! Is somebody whistling "Yankee Doodle"?

Seeing a darky in some kind of American naval garb, with the name of the American warship on the band of his cap and a diminutive American flag on the breast of his blue woolen shirt, he hailed him, hurried toward him, grasped his hand proudly, clapped him on the back, spoke to him, and put questions to him.

"But maybe, Sir," said the merry black patriot, as he asked his name, "I might have a card for you." The darky took from a small letterbag which he carried an envelope bearing the stranger's name and containing a large card, by which a far-famed Rear Admiral of the American Navy invited him to an afternoon party on board the United States flagship—while at the foot of the card of invitation he saw the words: "Boats will be at the landing at Villefranche."

It was a new and charming experience to him. He had not known that it was customary for American naval commanders on touching at a foreign port to issue complimentary invitations to some of their countrymen living there.

His joy was unconfined; he seemed to be floating in the air; he was overcome by an impulse to make his way to that landing at once.

As he approached it, the band of the flagship was playing "The Star-Spangled Banner"—yes, playing it in French waters, on the shores of the purple and gleaming Mediterranean. Hark! He was in an ecstasy. Not on earth was there any other such music. He sang the words with fervor. Look! See! For he saw floating over the warship the American flag, the loveliest flag, as it now seemed to him, that ever fluttered in the breeze, the flag of his own, his native land. He wept for joy. "My country forever!" Old times had come back again.

A boat sent by the Rear Admiral took him aboard the flagship. The Rear Admiral welcomed him. Was there in all Europe such another hero? He thought he heard the strains of "America"; he wanted to clasp the flag to his bosom. His patriotism was emotional. It seemed to him that he was again in "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

All was well with him now. It was the transformation of one who had fallen into the dumps at home and cast off patriotism because of poor luck, poor spirits, and poor digestion.

And when the day came for that afternoon party aboard the Rear Admiral's flagship, when he saw there American life, American beauties, American naval officers, the American flag, and American provender, wasn't he happy? and didn't he join in the dance? and didn't he wish he was once more in his own star-spangled country?

He has now got back to New York, cured of croaking, out of the dumps, free from pessimism and misanthropy. When he landed here he shook fervidly the hand of an old-time chum who met him, and said:

"This is my own loved country, and a man is sure to love it all the better after he has wandered on foreign shores."

"The proud Stars and Stripes, the American flag,
'Tis the flag of our freedom and power;
The flag of our sires, the flag of our love;
The flag of our soul every hour."

DISPENSARIES KEPT BUSY.

Liquor Traffic Through Them in South Carolina Has Reached Immense Proportions Recently.

Special to The New York Times.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Dec. 15.—During the past three months the liquor traffic through the dispensaries has grown to tremendous proportions. It may be that since the victory of the dispensary in the August primaries over the combined opposition it has been accepted more generally as an established State institution, and is drawing the patronage of those who heretofore imported their drinks. But whatever the cause, the sales have jumped up in a manner to insure largely increased assets for the county and municipal governments.

The Dispensary Board buys monthly supplies needed for the succeeding month. The supplies ordered for the holiday trade show that more drinking is expected this Christmas than ever before in the State's history. The order includes among other things nearly 2,500 barrels of whisky. This is mostly of the cheap grades of rye and corn. Then there are thousands of cases of all kinds of fine goods. The total orders aggregate $600,000.

Although the local dispensaries buy up and collect old bottles and flasks, and they are used several times over, an idea of the magnitude of the business is furnished by an order given to a Pennsylvania glass factory. It is for one hundred and fifty carloads of flasks—millions of them. They will come down in five trains and will, it is said, be the largest single shipment of merchandise ever sent South. Tons of cork and tin foil are also ordered.

THE HAGUE IN HOLIDAY GARB

Reign of Santa Claus Celebrated Throughout the Netherlands.

QUEEN'S LATEST PHOTOGRAPH

Preparations for the Royal Marriage—Description of the Wedding Gown—Young Ruler's Popularity.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

THE HAGUE, Dec. 1.—This morning appeared the latest photographs of the Queen of Holland. It was as if all at once it had rained queens, for not only those shops that usually sell photographs flooded their windows with them, but all the "notion" shops, candy shops, and book shops sold them just as fast as the buyers could squeeze in to lay down their money.

Every one was eager, and no wonder, for it is a speaking likeness of the Queen. It is not in the least flattering, and, although her Majesty is bedecked with costly jewels, she has the expression of her everyday self, and one sees just that half smile whenever she comes before her people.

I saw it this afternoon, when on the road to Schweningen I met the royal carriage taking Queen Wilhelmina and her mother, who seems never to leave her side, for their afternoon drive. They go always immediately after luncheon, which meal is evidently partaken of with all absence of ceremony, for it was 1:45 when I met them, and a long way from the palace. It is said that the Queen keeps to the old-fashioned Dutch hours, and I know for a fact that her caterer must send in every day several menus to the Queen, and that, much to his disappointment, she selects always the plainest dishes.

She rises exceedingly early, rarely after 7, and it has created considerable talk among her Ministers, who are none of them of quite the youthful fibre as her Majesty, and who often in Winter go shivering over to the palace before the sun is very far up.

REIGN OF SANTA CLAUS.

It is now the season of Santa Claus in Holland, and shops and streets are full. Added to the interest of Santa Claus, the Queen's pictures, and wedding souvenirs, are the colors of the Transvaal. These bedeck all that is purchasable, from glorious silk flags intertwined with the orange, down to covers of candy boxes. Even the "borst plaatjes," which are the special sweets for the season of Sint Nicolaas, are laid out in rows of red, white, blue, and green. It makes a really pretty combination, the green seeming to blend in harmony the blazing hues of red, white, and blue. It is very amusing to see the big Sinte Klaasjes, as certain very spicy and crisp cakes are called, standing in rows in the windows, with Transvaal sashes around their shapeless waists.

There are new-comers this year to the Sinte-Klaas society. Usually, only the old, old pattern of cake—the Vrijer and the Vrijster (lover and sweetheart)—are on sale, but this year Oom Paul, with a lovely big hat—and for the small boy—and the trim, soldierlike forms of the future Frias Gemaal have joined that old-fashioned pair, and fly the colors "of the oppressed" on hat and bresst.

But what is always the most amusing feature at Sint Nicolaas time is the youthful enjoyment of the people, and to see clergymen, Ministers of State, scholars, doctors, clubmen, and society swells buying sugar horses, cocks, and rabbits and offering one another a "taste" from his particular paper bag, the "suiker beestjes" growing visibly less as friend encounters friend on the street. They laugh and joke over the various specimens of sugared art and go about in crowds, entering the shops to have the fun of buying a whole string of chocolate hearts. Truly the Continental man has a boyish streak that neither the English nor the Americans show on such occasions, although, on the reverse side, when the serious afairs of life are to be met with, I find him more sober and painstaking.

Every nook of the town is alive to-day, and after the hours of school it is risking your life almost to walk the streets. Firstly, the streets are narrow, especially where the shops are. Then, whole families turn out from the haunts of the working classes—with grandma, in addition to a good round number of "jongens en meisjes." As every family in Holland is blessed with a dog or two, this parade sets forth, and there is often a lively time around the shop windows, particularly at that moment when the "yaller dog" of the Groene wegje happens to meet his special rival of the Oranje-Plein!—these being two of the most popular tenement districts of The Hague.

But all are welcome at Sint Nicolaas time, and that worthy gentleman goes forth through the streets on a white horse, in the robes of a Bishop, with a Pope's hat on his head, dispensing cakes and candies in the midst of an admiring crowd. The Bishop-Santa Claus is followed by what the Dutch call the "Zwarte Knecht," a black body servant, who carries switches for the bad ones among the crowd. Of course, the boys are singled out, but, with a boy's quickness, the blows are usually dodged, and the "yaller dog," which is always curious to see all that goes on, is sure to get the switch—and his vote of thanks adds to the noise, as well as the merriment, of the boys from the Groene wegje.

At midnight only do the shops close, and all day long the streets are filled with young and old to make welcome the visit of Sinte Klaas.

THE QUEEN'S WEDDING GOWN.

Preparations for Queen Wilhelmina's marriage go on, although the date has not yet been announced. The wedding gown, however, is being embroidered by the willing fingers of young girls who are at work in the Society of "Kunstnaaldwerk" (art needlework) of Amsterdam. It is to be of the richest white satin, with the lion of the Netherlands embroidered in gold. This is a very graceful and picturesque wild beast, this lion of the Netherlands, being en profile, with one paw extended as he rises on his hind legs to look over—well, we will say the whole world, for when he sprang into existence Holland was a mighty land.

Everywhere societies are being formed to contribute to the feasts of the wedding time. If all one hears is true a separate palace will have to be built to hold the presents that are being proposed for her Majesty's wedding day. One must not forget that Queen Wilhelmina has been a true child of the nation, and has grown up very simply, and done pretty much what other girls have done. There has never been any arrogance in her attitude toward her people. The attitude of each of her Ministers has been that of a father toward his daughter.

I overheard a remark the other day which goes to show how the young Queen is respected. The name of a young married woman, who had caused considerable talk, was suggested as a lady in waiting to the Queen:

"No," rejoined some one, "our young Queen must not have women about her whose influence is other than elevating!"

A good many changes must of necessity take place in the household of the palace after the wedding. The Queen's mother must leave her child and go to live elsewhere.

For some months past the small palace in the Lange Voorhout has been undergoing repairs. The group of cherubs that flutter over the top peak of the façade have one by one appeared from under the hand of the stone cutter with clean faces now and their tiny wings glistening white, whereas before they held in their folds the dust and dirt of many years. All along the window edges fine stone trellis work appears which no one ever knew existed under the thin covering of moss which, on account of the constant moisture, gathers on wood and stone everywhere in Holland. Velvet green moss-covered trees line the wide drive that leads from this palace down the length of the Voorhout, which means—before the woods. The Voorhout is on one end of the Tournooiveld, which was, in olden days, the field for tournaments. Here it is that the Queen mother will live, not far from, but still separated from, her child.

HERTOG HENDRIK'S ABODE.

There is now great excitement over the coming of Hertog Hendrik to take up his abode in Het Huisten Bosch. This, as will be remembered, is where was held the Peace Conference. Situated in the upper end of the beautiful wood, Het Huisten Bosch makes a delightful home, and before another week passes Hertog Hendrik will likely find it one. He must become a Hollander before he marries, and, in order to do so, must first have a household in Holland. The only thing we have heard, however, of his "lares et penates" is the sending of nine blooded horses to The Hague; for, after taking a look at the Queen's stables, His Highness was not heard to utter many compliments on her Majesty's choice in horses.

There are many opinions as to what is best befitting as a wedding gift from the nation to the Queen. Some suggest a new palace; some a national park. Others want a Summer villa, or an opera house. This last appeals to many, for the present opera house in The Hague is a deplorable pile, with no stage equal to the proper setting of light opera, and as to theatres, there is none in the Residentie. The players take "off nights" with the French opera—in what is called the Schonnburg—and it is rather difficult to decide which is the worse performance of the two.

But, notwithstanding, when the dark days come on in The Hague, as soon as the St. Nicolaas fun is over, the people who must be amused crowd for seats at the most trivial performances, for the evenings are terribly long in Holland, and it is hard work for those who like to be on the go to come home before 4 o'clock in the afternoon to sit in lighted rooms and to get happily through the interminable evening. The general dining hour is half-past 5.

Those who love home, however, whose taste for better things than poorly given comedies brings them gladly in from the damp atmosphere that makes Holland a dreary place in the dark-day season, for such it is delightful to get in and find a big blaze of turf on the hearth, with the cat snugly purring on the rug and the kettle singing to suggest the tea hour, the soft light of the lamp from under the shade of lace, a generous chair, an inviting book, or a friend who has come in to chat. To such the evenings seem not too long within the truly comfortable Dutch home.

MEVROUW HANKEN-PARKER.

HEARD ABOUT TOWN.

This was the clever way in which a well-groomed, well-poised, and self-reliant young woman disposed of one of the genus "masher" who tried to force his unwelcome attentions on her. It happened on a recent afternoon on an Eighth Avenue surface car. When the young lady boarded the car all the seats were occupied. A rather flashily attired young man ostentatiously proffered his seat. When the young lady accepted he clung to the strap hanging directly in front of and over her head. From this point of vantage he leered at and ogled the lady to her manifest annoyance. When she arose to leave the car at One Hundred and Eleventh Street he followed. Rain had begun falling, which, to the "masher" seemed a manifest opportunity for him to achieve his conquest. So, raising his umbrella as he left the car, he remarked to her: "I see, Miss, that you have no umbrella," at the same time stepping forward to offer the protection afforded by his.

"It seems to me that you are a person with remarkably keen powers of observation," icily observed the young woman, as she gathered up her skirts and started off on her homeward journey.

It was all she had to say, but it effectually disposed of that "masher," who stalked rapidly in the opposite direction, to the great amusement of the single observer of the little comedy.

It's only the appearance of an opportunity that shows the general desire for vaccination felt all about town. Last Sunday a doctor called on one of his patients in an up-town apartment house. When her needs had been ministered to; the husband, a busy man during the week days, asked the physician if he happened to have any vaccine points with him. He had. So the husband was vaccinated. While this operation was in progress the nurse in attendance loosened the sleeve of her dress, and, turning to the husband, said: "With your permission, as I have not been vaccinated in five or six years," and she, too, was vaccinated. The cook came next, and her needs were attended to. Then the man of the house thought of the elevator boy, who had said he had never been vaccinated. He went to the janitor to get permission to visit the doctor, and brought back with him a request that the doctor would also vaccinate the janitor. That, of course, he was willing to do. So, with only the opportunity that all wanted available, five persons in one apartment were vaccinated. A sixth would have been had not the janitor's wife been away making a Sunday call on one of her friends.

Members of the Automobile Club of America are seriously talking of running a public coach in the Spring from one of the fashionable hotels in town to one of the country clubs, probably the Ardsley. If the scheme matures it is to be carried out on the same plan as that employed by the gentlemen who indulge in four-in-hand public coaching, and the projectors of the scheme expect to get fully as much fun out of it. A machine that shall be a reproduction of a handy break, and that will seat about a dozen persons, is to be constructed for the purpose of the run, and various members of the club will take turns at the levers on different days of the week. There has been some talk of making the run from here to Philadelphia, as was done by a public coach a few years ago, but some of the hard roads to be traveled and the necessities for recharging the machine will probably result in a decision to have the run confined to points within a few hours' reach of town. Manipulators of the machines are sure that the days of coaching are numbered, in this city at least, and probably in Newport. They think they will be able to provide a substitute that will be taking with the public. To the laymen, aside from the fact that it will be more expensive and a bit more exclusive, there does not seem to be much in favor of an automobile trip as against the ordinary journey on a trolley road car.

One of the latest schemes of a clever woman forced to earn her own living is establishing herself as a bird doctor. Canaries are her specialty, and she has established a hospital where she attends to the ills of these pets. Broken limbs, disordered digestive apparatus, catarrhs, and fevers are treated by the woman with benefit to the birds and profit to herself. Other song birds and house pets, and even the repulsive parrot, are treated for their ailments by this bird doctor, who is said to be the only woman in the world making a specialty of this business. So well established is her fame in this direction that she makes visits to Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities when called, and has established a regular clientele there, as well as here, among dealers who make the handling of birds an incident to their other business, as is the case at some of the department stores.

Such brisk, snappy mornings as those of the past few days bring the roses to the cheeks of the young women who are taking lessons at four-in-hand driving in the Park. One of these pupils recently had a party of seven men on the coach she was tooling through the drives, no other woman being in the party. She did not appear to be more than eighteen years of age, but she handled her team with all the skill and sang-froid of a professional, and thoroughly enjoyed the sport. Even the crush and crowd of Fifth Avenue at high noon had no terrors for her, as she threaded her way down to the Waldorf, having no fear of automobiles, bicycles, or horse-drawn traps of the various sorts that moved through the avenue during what was for her a sort of triumphal procession. Morris E. Howlett, the Parisian coach man, is one of the instructors who is now putting the finishing touches to the handling of fours by some of the young ladies who have taken a fancy for this sort of thing, and who want to be the latest wrinkles as practiced on the other side of the water. A young lady from Chicago who contemplates a social season abroad is one of his pupils, as a coaching trip is to be part of her European education.

One young woman managed to create the sensation she evidently intended yesterday when she walked down Fifth Avenue and into the shopping district. Stitched around the left sleeve of the huge automobile coat she wore was a wide band of crêpe, such as coachmen wear when the family of the owner of his team is in mourning. That the mourning of the young woman was very sincere did not appear from any of the rest of her toggery, as there was neither crêpe nor any other sort of black goods about it, her gown being of a pale purple and her hat resplendent in the huge colored flowers which women affect at this time. She didn't appear to be an actress on an advertising tour. Possibly she was trying to be a leader of fashion. She was certainly "the cynosure of all eyes," as the writers of the Laura Jean Libbey school like to put it.

If you would be thoroughly up to date in the dietetic fads you must make your midday luncheon of either bread and milk, crackers and milk, or some one of the many prepared "health foods" and milk. Milk is the inevitable thing. What goes with it is a side issue. This modest sort of meal is now being served at all of the fashionable resorts. The reason for it seems to be the belief among the women that the milk is "the best thing in the world for the complexion." As every woman goes in for a healthy complexion as a necessity in these days of golf and riding to hounds and automobiling, those who do none of these things have taken to the milk diet as a means to supply what vigorous exercise brings to her sisters. There is one sensible thing about this fad. It certainly does no harm, even if no direct good results from it.

While little is heard about it here in New York, there is really one of the sharpest of recent "rate wars" in progress among the Sound steamboat lines between here and Providence. The fight is really for the Boston trade, but as the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company has a monopoly of that part of it from Providence to Boston which is by rail, that end of the fight practically amounts to nothing. Time was when the fare by the boats between here and Providence was $4. Then there came into being an opposition line, which cut the rate to one-half that sum. When that was met by the old companies, the new one again cut the figure in half. That opposition boat runs but three days a week at the $1 rate, the older lines having a monopoly of the business at double that price on the other three days. Recently, to meet the cut rate, one of the boats of the old line has been put on the route for three days a week during the winter with a rate of 75 cents for the trip. As there is little sentiment among people who are looking for the cheapest route, this newest competitor is having all the passengers it can carry. Merchants who have business up Providence or Boston way are as large patrons of the boat which offers the lowest rate as are the very poorer classes who are forced to travel. They are also rejoicing over the rumor now afloat that the new-comers for the traffic talk of reducing the fare to Providence to 50 cents. If this is done, it will make it possible to make the trip from here to Boston for $1.50, an even lower rate than that which prevailed during a somewhat similar rate war nearly a generation ago.

For those who wish to be ludicrously extravagant in their Christmas present giving some of the exclusive shoemakers have provided a way. At least one concern in town is making a specialty of white or pale tinted satin slippers for my lady. Clever designs painted in oils are supplemented with decorative work in seed pearls and tiny diamonds, the whole set off with buckles in which small gems glisten. The cost of these trifles is limited only by the measure of the pocketbook of the investor.

Hotel people and those in the shopping districts have been extracting no end of fun out of the recent visit of Manchester and his bride, accompanied by the elderly spinster who has been the press agent for the Duke for a couple of years, and who still continues to act in that capacity for the pair of strawberry decorated notorieties. Every detail of the doings of the precious pair was duly bulletined for the eyes and ears of a world supposedly waiting to know all about their performances. The real fun seems to have come to the clerks in the shops where the Duchess condescended to spend a few thousands of Pa Zimmerman's dollars. As accompanied by the ducal press agent she flitted about from shop to shop, as if she was a Princess of the royal blood. Once inside an establishment the press agent in a megaphonic voice would announce to a clerk, but really for the benefit of all in the shop, that "her Grace" would not care for this or that; that such a duolor was not suitable to "her Grace's" complexion. Every possible change was rung on that her Grace business for listening ears. Let the poor little bride slip away from the wing of her chaperon—and the clerks say the latter took good care that she should do it every few moments—and shrilly there would arise a cry of "Will your Grace step this way a moment, please, as I am sure this is just what you want?" and that sort of thing from morning to night. All of which, of course, attracted attention to the retiring little Ohio girl, who does not seem to be a bad sort at all if allowed to be a lady, as her instincts incline. But with this shouting and fussy press agent attending her the Duchess had anything but a pleasant time of it in securing her Winter costumes. Her agent was a source of almost endless amusement to the shop people. Now the clerks, when they are not too busy, are having all manner of fun among themselves imitating her airs and the methods adopted to attract attention to her charge. One of the few jolly incidents of the rather monotonous lives of the clerks has gone with the departure of the pair to Cincinnati.

Ordinarily New York gets its crop of chestnuts and walnuts from this State and New England. This year in both sections the crop was one of the smallest known, and the supply of both nuts in the local market has been very small. Chestnuts are practically out of the market already, and what few walnuts there are to be had come from Ohio, Iowa, Illinois, and even the further Western States.

It appears that there are fashions in fruits as well as in other things in this life. Last year for example there was a constant and paying demand for Jamaica oranges. All that were imported met with ready sale, and there were large profits for both growers and importers. California navels were the only rivals to the Jamaica fruit, and the Florida orange was in disrepute. This year all this has changed. Jamaica fruits are in such poor demand that they are a drug in the market, and no money is made in handling them, as compared with last year. Every one wants Florida fruit, in spite of the fact that Florida oranges so far this year are more like lemons than oranges in flavor, while the Jamaicas are far sweeter and more palatable. California fruit of all sorts is asked for on all sides as well. People in the fruit district are puzzling their brains to try to find a solution for this sudden change in the tastes of their customers. What the reason is no one of them can say. They call it a whim, and let it go at that.

MAN FROM BOSTON SURPRISED.

Found in the Street After "Just One More," His Money Gone.

"You were drunk and lying in the street last night," said Magistrate Hogan, in the Yorkville Police Court, yesterday morning, addressing Frederick Carroll, who says he hails from Boston.

"Is that so, Judge?" replied Carroll, in amazement. "That's newa to me. The last thing I can remember is ordering one more drink in Tom Sharkey's. I had had two. I was surprised to find myself in jail this morning. I failed, however, to find $280 that I had in my pocket last night."

"What did you drink at Tom Sharkey's?" inquired the Court.

"You can search me, Judge; I don't know. All I know is that it was wet."

"Three dollars," said the Magistrate, and Carroll, having no money about him, was led below.

Ball of the Old Guard.

Preparations for the Old Guard annual ball, to be held at the Metropolitan Opera House, Jan. 24, are already well advanced, and it is believed that the affair will be one of the most brilliant in the history of the organization. Several Governors of near-by States are expected to be present, and military organizations from Boston, Charleston, New Haven, and other cities.

The music will be by the two Old Guard bands, numbering in all 200 pieces. The grand march, which begins at midnight, promises to be a gorgeous spectacle, for the decorations planned will embody many novel features. The demand for boxes at the armory at Broadway and Forty-ninth Street, exceeds that of any previous year.

RECEIVING SHIP'S "REGISTER."

The last immigrant has slept aboard the Narragansett. For more than two years the old ship has been tied up at the Ellis Island pier, where, partitioned off into "large airy apartments," she has been utilized by the immigration authorities as a dormitory for detained immigrants. When the fire occurred in 1897 that destroyed the old station it was necessary to provide temporary sleeping quarters for the immigrants, and the Narragansett being by far the largest of the boats in the service was transferred into a sort of floating dormitory. Her removal last week from the island to Noank, Conn., where she will be torn to pieces and converted into that least ornate of all craft, a coal barge, removes one of the most interesting auxiliaries of the immigration service.

She was built at the close of the civil war for service on the Sound, in which trade she continued until she was acquired by the Government a few years ago. The only interesting thing about the old ship was what the bureau officials and attachés termed her "official register." This register was not of tonnage, but of a purely personal nature. On her walls, the panels of her doors, and the posts in the passageways every imm

BUDDHIST LEADERS' LETTER ON CHINA

Japanese Priests Address Ecclesiastics of the World.

MISSIONARIES ARE BLAMED

Six high priests of Buddha, representing the Great Japan Buddhists' Union, at their headquarters, at Kenninji Temple, in Kioto, Japan, have issued a circular letter in connection with what its signers describe as "The Chinese Emergency." It is addressed "To All the Ecclesiastics in the World."

The document, prepared by these leaders of the different sects which embrace the religion of Buddha, deals with the causes which led to the recent anti-foreign uprising in China, and suggests a possible solution of the troubles there. It gives a careful analysis of the Chinese character, and lays the principal blame for the difficulties at the doors of the foreign missionaries, apparently upon those who are non-American. Copies of the circular have been sent to the several countries of Europe, North and South America, and to the British colonies. A copy, translated into English, was received in this city yesterday. The letter says in part:

"We, the Buddhists of Great Japan, beg to inform our revered ecclesiastical brethren in the world that the disturbances in China having now reached their climax, her national prestige is at stake, her administration is virtually held in abeyance, and, moreover, the Boxers being still at large, the fundamental statutes of the country have fallen into utter disorder. It is true that within men of public spirit are now awaiting, who, with the utmost energy and enthusiasm, are endeavoring to avert the present situation, and that without some of the friendly powers are ready to assist them in their cause. Yet there is hardly any prospect for the restoration of the empire to its former condition, and 400,000,000 souls are virtually at a loss to know what course to take. Under these circumstances the social distress as well as moral corruption have now reached a pitch too serious to be described in detail. How and when is such a disorganization to be remedied? How is it possible for us who have pledged ourselves to undertake the work of salvation to remain silent with folded hands?

"The question justifies itself when we consider that the present complications in China are likely to affect to a serious extent the interests of the whole world. Still more forcibly does it obtrude itself when we consider that the disturbances in China are supposed to have had their origin in the workings of religion. Although in regard to schemes for the amelioration of the condition of the Middle Kingdom in future we have to look to the mutual negotiations between the proper authorities of China and of the powers, yet we are fully convinced that the work of eradicating the roots of evil and consolidating the permanent welfare and peace of China must necessarily be placed in the hands of the propagandists of religion.

"With these views on the situation we, the followers of Buddha, out of friendly feelings toward China as a neighbor, in discharge of a religious obligation upon us as teachers of religion, and more particularly from the sense of a responsibility devolving upon us in connection with religion in China, have thought it expedient to submit our sentiments to the consideration of ecclesiastics throughout the world; inasmuch as we are perfectly confident that the benevolent and generous ecclesiastics of the world, pardoning our audacity and removing the barriers now existing in respect of differences in religion, will accede to and sympathize with our proposals for the sake of the welfare of the Chinese people and the tranquillity of the world at large.

THE DUTIES OF MISSIONARIES.

"Religion embodies a supreme path to be followed by men, and therefore the propagators of its doctrine ought never to be disturbed by temptations existing beyond the pale of religion. If, yielding to restrictions imposed by society, they are to change the spirit of their instruction in respect of the difference or peculiar circumstances of a country, its race, civilization, and customs and manners, or are to endeavor to accomplish ends other than those dictated by the legitimate principles of religion, by implicating themselves in human ambition or intrigue, they must virtually be regarded as having lost the footing on which their fundamental principles require them firmly to stand.

"There can be no denying that the sincerity as well as enthusiasm displayed by the ministers of Christian Churches in China is anything but insignificant. They have not only succeeded in establishing churches in every territory and distributing their preachers in the various provinces, but also secured, by dint of unremitting efforts, suitable machinery for the salvation of the souls of the Chinese people by instituting schools, libraries, hospitals, poor asylums, orphanages, kindergartens, printing as well as publishing offices, all of them absolutely indispensable for the development of civilization, and all magnificently equipped and maintained for the furtherance of social welfare in China. The Chinese, however, contrary to expectation, have not only failed to appreciate the favors bestowed upon them by the foreign missionaries, but have destroyed church buildings, persecuted ministers, and taken the lives and property of Christians, with little or no thought of consequences—in short, their violence and cruelty have known no bounds.

CAUSE OF TROUBLES IN CHINA.

"Surely there must be substantial reasons for such an anomaly. Whenever we reflect upon the circumstances we cannot but express our profound regret for the deeds of the missionaries in China. In investigating the cause of the anti-religious spirit of the Chinese, we find that apprehension and terror entertained toward the foreign missionaries were virtually the origin of their implacable hostility. They have perceived that these missionaries have secured for themselves an immunity calculated to subvert their established customs and manners; they have also recognized in their attitude a tendency to ignore the statutes of the country, and a desire to accomplish the most selfish ends by the oppression of the State, whereas non-believers, though legally innocent, were frequently entrapped into crime. Under these circumstances they were led to the conclusion that the foreign missionaries in China have been exerting their energies for the accomplishment of a certain pernicious ambition by stirring up the superficial rabble of the country, and with this object in view made their chapels and cathedrals a sort of asylum for evil-minded.

"The Chinese began to entertain the idea that the missionaries were intimately connected with the foreign policy of their own countries, and that, having made themselves instrumental in carrying out the intrigues of their own Governments, they must have latterly come to some sinister design, such as the extension of territory, along with the development of commerce. They saw with gross apprehension that in respect of foreign machinations the missionaries were the first to come followed by Consuls, with troops at their backs, and they have formed the belief that he who had come with a Bible in his hand stood a watcher armed with a spear and a sword.

"To this is to be attributed the cause of suspicion as well as apprehension on the part of the Chinese; in this is to be found an element of provocation for the recent insurrection in China.

A SUGGESTED REMEDY.

"Such being the case, we, the Buddhists of Japan, cannot but express our desire that all the ecclesiastics in the world would, in conjunction with us, recognize the above fact—a fact which clearly shows that the missionaries in China have proceeded far beyond the fundamental principles of religion—and devote their energies to formulating a plan by which the suspicion as well as the apprehension harbored by the Chinese against the foreign missionaries may be successfully removed. Unless such a scheme be adopted, the 400,000,000 of souls are certain to degenerate into a state of overwhelming distress and affliction, and the East Asian firmament is permanently to be darkened with clouds of disaster and insurrection. We, as disciples of Buddha, can hardly restrain our fears and lamentation at such a prospect, when we think of the Great Truth shining above and of 400,000,000 souls groping below.

"But how is the fear and apprehension on the part of the Chinese to be cleared away? On this question we Buddhists are prepared to submit two proposals to the propagators of religion in the world for their sincere acceptance and approval. The first is, that the ecclesiastical authorities in the world should exercise their influence in restraining the missionaries in China from proceedings which are likely to create suspicion on the part of the Chinese as to the existence of their secret connection with the foreign policy of their own countries. They should, for instance, be withheld from inducing their own Governments to carry out schemes conducive to successful aggrandizement at the expense of China, on the plea of persecution inflicted—a plea frequently resorted to whenever more or less suffering has been inflicted on them by the Chinese. Nor should they be allowed to claim compensation for damages incurred, as they hitherto have done, for nothing can be more incompatible with the true principles of religion.

"When, some time ago, a Japanese Buddhist temple at Amoy was burned by the Chinese, we Buddhists, being desirous to persuade the home Government to refrain from pressing the Chinese authorities on this particular account, have renounced all claims for damage, and this we did simply with a view to the discretion which we ought to exercise in the interests of religion.

"The second proposition we have to submit to our venerable brethren consists in withholding the missionaries in China from all forms of procedure which might possibly be regarded as disturbing the social institutions of China.

"They must, in fact, be prohibited from any line of conduct subversive of the ancient customs and manners of China, or derogatory to her laws, or liable to be recognized as producing abuses of misprision through partiality displayed toward the converts as against non-believers—proceedings which can in no way be reconciled with the legitimate doctrine of religion. True, the Chinese civilization is as yet rudimentary, and improvements may, in many respects, be necessary in the customs and manners of the country. Still, nothing can be a greater mistake on the part of foreigners than to attempt to overthrow the whole organization at one blow, with a view to substituting their own customs and manners."

ART AT THE UNION LEAGUE.

For its December loan exhibition the Union League Club presents another interesting small display of foreign and American paintings. The exhibition is catholic in scope and ranges from a portrait by Ferdinand Bol, recently shown at the Durand-Ruel Galleries, an early Dutch picture attributed to Rembrandt, a splendid portrait of a man, by the old Swiss artist Jean Grimoux, a follower of Rembrandt, and a Ruysdael marine, through a beautiful George Morland, a charming example of Sir Thomas Lawrence, a portrait of Mrs. Stock, to a dexterous studio interior by Fortuny, another clever interior by Munkacsy; to a good Jacque, a Jongkind, two Cazins, a Harpignies, an example of the modern English landscape school by B. W. Leader, and an example of the modern Dutch school by Albert Neuhuys, to American canvases by W. P. Ryder, Edward A. Bell, the decorative figure painter, and Thomas Moran.

There is certainly food here for all tastes, and it is not an uninstructive task to study the methods and characteristics of painters of such widely contrasted schools and separated periods. The three American pictures show up well. Thomas Moran's portrayal of the Shoshone Falls of Snake River, with their frame of towered cliffs, the waters plunging below them into depths of gruel in a crystal clear atmosphere and under a blue sky mottled with fleecy clouds, is not only strong and bold, but painted with a sensitiveness to and appreciation of the grandeur of nature that inspires as well as awes the spectator. "The American Turner," as Mr. Moran's admirers often call him, has produced no stronger and finer landscape in many a day. The example of Edward A. Bell, "The Sun Bath," which shows a woman and child seated on a divan, the latter in full sunlight, is a distinct advance. Mr. Bell has heretofore been known by somewhat dreamy decorative figure canvases which, while pleasing, have not been overstrong. In this last work he paints more boldly and leaves his low color keys and softer schemes for high lights and strongest color. The sunlight effect is unusually good. The example of W. P. Ryder, a marine, "Moonlight," is characteristic, but too sombre in color and lacks spontaneity.

Of the foreign pictures the Fortuny "The Amateurs," which has been seen in New York before, is brilliant and dexterous to a degree. It is one of those studio interiors with accessories which he loved so well to paint, and makes the Munkacsy, also an interior—a Parisian house, with a child and dogs—seem weak. The Jacque is one of the best shown here in some time, a characteristic "Shepherd and Flock," and the Jongkind "A Dutch Canal," is fairly good. Little can be said of the two examples by Cazin, and the venerable Harpignies is not at his best in "Evening at Herrison." The modern English school is represented by a landscape by B. W. Leader, engravings from whose works are so popular. This example is lacking in atmosphere, has little sentiment, and is hard in color. Delightful are the two examples of the early English school—a landscape by George Morland, broadly and strongly handled and rich in tone, and the splendid portrait by Sir Thomas Lawrence, notable for its graceful and easy drawing and rich color. Of the early Dutch school the portrait by Ferdinand Bol, "A Lady," has a remarkably attractive and beautiful color scheme of light yellowish brown. The "Portrait of a Man," by John Grimoux, while a reflection of Rembrandt and Van Dyck, is both strong and clever. The display will be open to members of the club to-day and to-morrow.

PAINTINGS BY W. DE L. DODGE.

William de Leftwich Dodge, a young American artist who attracted some attention a few years ago by his decorative canvases, has recently returned from Paris, where he went after his marriage to Miss Fannie Pryor, daughter of ex-Judge Pryor, some four years ago, for further study and work, and is holding an exhibition of some sixty-five of his recent canvases, together with a number of original colored illustrations for reproductions in certain publications at the American Art Galleries.

Mr. Dodge, while he shows progress and improvement in these recent works over that which brought him some reputation here some years ago, has not yet, as the French say, "arrived." He was always a vigorous if not too careful draughtsman, and the present paintings show that he still possesses strength in this respect. His color sense is still undefinable; almost all of the pictures shown are painted in an extremely high key and have vivid sunlight effect, but they are dry, devoid of atmosphere, and, for the most part, frankly impressionistic, without the delicacy and softness of color which the great leaders of the modern impressionistic school of France possess. The artist has studied Alma Tadema, as well as the French impressionists, and one of the largest and best of his paintings, a huge decorative canvas, entitled "The Eighth Olympiad, a Grecian Festival," might almost be an Alma Tadema enlarged for a drop-curtain. There are good drawing, fine composition, and some excellent painting of details, particularly of the mosaic floor and the polished floor on which the dancer poses, in this work. It is, however, dry and lacking in atmosphere. The most pleasing to the writer of the larger canvases are the decorative "Gathering Flowers," the "Music Lesson," with its charming sunlight effect; the "Chrysanthemums," which has a fine color scheme well worked out; "La Cigale," with excellent effect of sunlight through the leaves; "La Sainte Ivresse," which has good drawing and flesh tones; the "Evening Dance," notable for the fine drawing of the figure and the soft light on the head and shoulders of the female figure, and the portrait of "Mother and Child," painted at dusk, which has a clever lamplight effect and much sympathy.

There is a touch of the modern French theatricalism in most of Mr. Dodge's work, notably his larger canvases. The huge painting, "Last Days of Tenachitlan—the Conquest of Mexico by Cortez," is dramatic to a degree, picturing a scene, which, according to Wilson and other authorities, could never have occurred. The canvas shows the result of careful archæological study, is splendidly composed, and has fine distance, but it is hard and cold in color. Like the "Olympiad," it would make a good drop curtain. In the picture "Orpheus Singing," Mr. Dodge simply riots in yellows. There are several marines which are low in key and cool in color. They are among the best work shown, having fine movement and good feeling, but they, too, are hard and cold. Of the illustrations, particularly those for the reproductions of a book on the grand operas, there is not much to be said. They are sketches, and while they have a certain spirit, are not attractive. The exhibition will remain open for some days. In connection with it are shown in an upper gallery the remarkable collections of butterflies, formed by Prof. Denton of Wellesley, Mass., and which received the gold and silver medals in the Department of Social Economy at the Paris Exposition.

AMBASSADOR WHITE'S ADVICE TO AMERICANS

Details Many Causes for Optimism at Present Time—Germany's Influence on the Culture of America.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Following is the speech delivered by Andrew D. White, United States Ambassador to Germany, at the Thanksgiving Day dinner of the American colony in Berlin this evening:

"It is, of course, entirely superfluous for me to give an assemblage like this any information or advice regarding the history, purposes, and manner of conducting a Thanksgiving dinner.

"But I may at least simply remind you that this is, of all things, a family festival. Such has always been its character. The President of the United States, you will observe, lays stress on that characteristic of it in his proclamation. The Governors of the various States do the same thing in theirs. In each of these documents it is clearly indicated that citizens are expected to assemble for the expression of their thankfulness, in families.

"Obedient to this view, the American colony to-night assembles as one family. You will therefore, each and all of you, consider yourselves as bound together by the bond of brotherhood, all, in fact, as sons and daughters of that allegorical personage so dear to caricaturists as 'U. S.,' our beloved Uncle Samuel.

"Whether you come from the shores of the Atlantic or of the Pacific, from the borders of the Great Lakes or of the Gulf of Mexico, whether your forefathers came to America in the Mayflower at the beginning of the seventeenth century, or in the floating palaces of the Hamburg-American Line or the North German Lloyd, at the end of the nineteenth, or, indeed, whether you have ever been in America at all, all of you here are for the time to consider yourselves as members of the family.

"This is the first injunction. The second is that the keynote of the whole gathering is to be thankfulness and gladness. Whether you belong to the class referred to conventionally in the newspapers as 'our honored fellow-citizens,' or be simply a young person just beginning to make your way in the world; whether you be rich beyond the dreams of avarice or afflicted by nervous doubts regarding the arrival of your next remittances; whether you are rejoicing over the election of Mr. McKinley or lamenting the defeat of Mr. Bryan, each and all of you to-night are expected to be thankful and happy. If the latter class of our fellow-citizens who are present, that is, the lemon-squash members of the family, find any difficulty in complying with this injunction, I commend them to the kind attention of the Republicans present, who certainly can afford to be helpful and generous.

CAUSES OF THANKFULNESS.

"Had it not been done so earnestly and eloquently in the hearing of so many of you, I would gladly point out a multitude of things for which we here to-night have a right to be thankful; but I will be merciful, and content myself with mentioning very few. To those present who represent the industrial and commercial interests of our country, there is surely cause for thankfulness in its present condition. I must, of course, avoid every tendency to a political argument, but I think we will all agree, now that election is over, that our country has never been so prosperous from a material point of view. And for this we all ought certainly to be thankful.

"Then, too, I would remind those who are interested as students in the pursuits of science, literature, and art that never was greater progress making in these fields than at the present time. The change for the better which has taken place within the last few years is enormous. During two months of the past summer I had the pleasure of returning to the United States and of visiting several of our intellectual centres, including two or three of our larger universities, and I was amazed, as every one must be who visits them, at the wonderful progress they are all making in the extension of libraries, laboratories, buildings for every purpose, the most of all, in the growth of their faculties and of their student bodies. Let me remind you that the statistics published at the end of last year showed that more than $60,000,000 had been given during that year by various individuals almost entirely for the promotion of instruction in various grades, and this by no means includes what has been given. The same stream of munificence continues, enlarging as it flows onward. To those, then, who are here as students in the university, or in the technical schools, or in the schools of art, there is every reason for thankfulness that the field before them in the United States grows larger and larger and more and more attractive.

"To those who are engaged in various branches of political and economic study, as well as to those engaged in the schools of theology and law, I may say that never in any nation have more interesting problems been awaiting solution than in ours at the present moment. Never has there been a better opportunity for devoted, patriotic service in the proper development of the institutions of our country than is now afforded us. For this those of you embarked in these studies, and, indeed, all of us, ought to be thankful.

AMERICA AND GERMANY.

"I may also remind you that there is cause for great thankfulness in the relations of our own beloved country with all foreign powers at this moment, and especially with Germany. While the United States, obedient to its traditions, has kept out of all entangling alliances with foreign powers, it has co-operated with them, and is to-day co-operating with them earnestly and fully in the greatest effort ever made for the advancement and protection of civilization in the Far East. I may at least say in regard to this, that from first to last, during the whole series of operations in China, the most kindly feelings have prevailed between the United States and Germany. And I may add that these still prevail. In all discussions which have taken place between the United States and Germany regarding the best method of bringing about a peace which shall be the beginning of a great new era for China and for the world, each of these two powers has shown itself not only anxious to do what is really best, but perfectly friendly and conciliatory. I think it is a matter for thankfulness that so good a spirit exists, and that it gives us hopes for a speedy and happy solution of the great questions involved.

"I am aware that there is considerable complaint among Americans residing abroad. It is frequently said to me by our countrymen that the United States is but little understood among the nations of the European Continent; that the tone of many of the newspapers which we daily see here is anything but friendly, and that they represent the resentful tone our country from anything but a favorable point of view. Reference is frequently made to wonderful statements to be found in some of these papers. Among these pieces of information have been in recent years statements that American children are brought up generally in hotels; that there has been a fashion among ladies to wear jewels not only upon their hands but upon their feet; that in some parts of America there has been a great mania for giving splendid funerals to household pets, such as cats and dogs. During the recent war with Spain some of these journals insisted constantly, and, indeed, to all appearance demonstrated, that Spain must be victorious; that as all Americans are rascals and care for nothing but money, our National ships of war would be found unseaworthy, our cannon worthless, our projectiles stuffed with sawdust, and our soldiers and sailors mongrels who could not stand for one moment against the noble Castilians who were fighting in the service of the grand old Spanish monarchy. Most striking of all, my attention was once called to an article of a pseudo-philosophic sort, in a very enterprising German journal, in which it was demonstrated that the Spanish women were vastly better educated than the American women, and that their love for attendance on the bull fights was really but a proof of their gentleness.

"Some Americans, too, are very much vexed to see all sorts of unfavorable reports—the garbage, in fact, of our larger capitals—carefully swept together by correspondents and displayed in sundry German journals, as exhibiting the normal condition of American society, and I am reminded from time to time that the American press is very remiss in not making reprisals, and that it would find an admirable field in reporting sensational trials now going on in this city.

PRESS CALUMNIES DO NO HARM.

"But allow me to say that I am not in favor of making any such reprisals. In fact, I see nothing in all this which should ruffle our tempers. It reminds one of the story of the big, burly countryman, whose high-tempered wife, in her ebullitions of temper, was accustomed to say very unpleasant things to him, and even to beat him, pinch him, and pull his hair; whereupon he remarked to a neighbor, who attempted to sympathize with him, that he did not mind these attacks in the slightest; that they did him no harm and seemed to do her a great deal of good. I think that is a philosophic frame of mind in which an American can afford to regard the calumnies of the sort which are lavished upon his country in sundry presses of the Continent. Indeed, here, too, I think I may point out a cause for thankfulness, for there is an old proverb to the effect that you find the most clubs and stones under the best apple trees, and I think this proverb applies in this case to our own country.

"But such things, after all, do not, I am sure, represent the feelings of Germans in general toward our country. We have strong evidences to the contrary. All here certainly have cause for thankfulness to this country of their temporary residence. No matter how unpleasant some pessimistic or cynical criticisms may be which you encounter here, we are all of us vastly indebted to the Government and people of this country for the great opportunities that are given us here in every field, and especially to the large part of this body who are engaged here in studies in literature, science, and arts. Nowhere are more splendid opportunities afforded; nowhere are they more freely thrown open to all. This very morning I saw a statement of the millions on millions that have been and are to be appropriated to the great museums of Berlin in the domains of science and art, and these are open just as freely to the American student as to the German.

"While Great Britain is generally known and honored as the mother country of the United States, Germany, from an intelectual point of view, is becoming more and more a second mother country; her influence is strongly to be seen in all our universities and technical schools; more than any other country she has aided in developing them and making them what they are—a vast force in the development of American civilization.

"Therefore, I call upon you to recognize heartily our indebtedness to the two great nations here represented, to the United States and to Germany; and I propose to you and ask you to drink with all the honors to the health, happiness, and prosperity of the President of the United States and of his Majesty, the King of Prussia and German Emperor."

LIBRARIES IN NEW JERSEY.

TRENTON, Dec. 15.—The lethargic and indifferent action of the past fifteen years, which marked the beginning and the struggles of the free-library movement in New Jersey, has given place to general activity on the part of the friends of free libraries. The erection of new buildings and the current expenditure of a million and a half of dollars are evidences that New Jersey will enter the twentieth century with a progression that will compare favorably with that of other States which have been making quick strides in the same direction.

Within a few years some twenty municipalities have decided to be taxed for the support of free libraries. The State has equipped forty-eight traveling libraries and has created a State Library Commission to encourage the creation of small libraries in rural communities. The expenditures for a new library in Newark and another in Jersey City amount to $700,000. New buildings are also being secured in Trenton, Orange, East Orange, Madison, Paterson, Passaic City, Bloomfield, and Hackensack.

Sixteen years ago Frank P. Hill inaugurated the first free library in connection with the Paterson Library. In recent years others have come forward with generous gifts. Andrew Carnegie gave East Orange $50,000; William M. Johnson of Bergen, now First Assistant Postmaster General of the United States, gave $50,000 for the new free library in Hackensack; Congressman Charles Nelson Fowler of Union County is to erect a new building, completely equipped, for Elizabeth; the hospital of the late Dr. William Strickler has given Orange a hundred-thousand-dollar library building; Mrs. Mary E. Ryle continues her generosity to the Paterson Library, now being extended; J. N. Jarvie is preparing to help Bloomfield, and D. W. Ills has endowed the Madison Library.

The new Newark Library will be ready for occupancy about February. The total cost will be $400,000. The library has always exceeded the other library ventures in the State, having about 70,000 volumes. This number is to be greatly increased when the new building is occupied. It will be filled with pictures, all originals, and by artists of national and some of world-wide fame. There will be hundreds, possibly several thousands, of them, and they will be in oils, in pen-and-ink, in water colors, and in all the mediums used by the artists of to-day. The pictures are to be loaned by Charles Scribner's Sons & Co. of New York for an indefinite period.

The progress of the free library movement in Jersey City has been phenomenal. For some time the success of the enterprise was handicapped by the limited conditions under which the library was operated. It has been forced to occupy the basement of the Hudson Bank Building, which is in the business section and away from the residential. This defect of locality was partly remedied by the distributing stations in sixteen parts of the city. The cost of the new Jersey City Library will be $260,000 when it is occupied, which will be in a few weeks. They have a handsome building of Connecticut granite and buff brick. It is a four-story building, covering an area of 46 by 190 feet, in the residential part of the city.

Trenton has laid the foundation for its new free library. It was only last year that the city voted to accept the free library act. The cost for the building and ground will be $100,000. It will stand on historic ground, the site of the old Trenton Academy having been chosen. The Trenton Library Trustees have available a rather peculiar bequest. It is the gift of Charles Skelton, who was a shoemaker, who served two terms in Congress. He was nominated on the Democratic ticket and did not have the least idea of being elected, but during the last two days of the campaign the drift was to him. He showed his gratitude by leaving several properties in trust for a free library, but stipulated that the money should not be expended for any works of fiction. The new Trustees are going to use it for books of reference.

Ferdinand Roebling of the company which built the Brooklyn Bridge is going to give a library of selected books of a grouping similar to that which won the prize at the Chicago Exposition.

The oldest library in the State is that of Burlington City, which four years ago ceased its corporate interest and became a free library, supported by municipal appropriation. This library comes down from Colonial times and its charter, which still hangs in the building, bears the seal of George II.

There are seventy-seven libraries in New Jersey, nearly all of them so-called free libraries, many of them supported by dues and subscription.

These libraries circulate 1,604,000 books a year. With the enlarged libraries it is estimated the circulation will be about 2,000,000 next year.

Another indication that the interest in books is rapidly growing is shown by the demand for the traveling libraries which the Federation of Women's Clubs was instrumental in inaugurating. There are now forty-eight of these libraries going the rounds. Thirty have made the round trip of forty-four towns.

The State Library Commission is thoroughly up to date, and will in the future sterilize all the books in the traveling libraries and will urge that all library books be sterilized as a precaution against the spread of disease. A circular bearing on this subject is soon to be issued by the State Board of Health to the trustees of all the free libraries.

Skinner Not Sentenced to be Shot.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Inquiry at the War Department discloses the fact that a record is on file there in the case of Linas Skinner, a Connecticut volunteer, who is reported in the news dispatches to have been sentenced to death in the Philippines for sleeping on post. In fact, the records of the department show that, up to date, no American soldier has, during the recent campaign, or, indeed, throughout the Spanish war, been sentenced to death for sleeping on post.

CHRISTMAS IN MT. LEBANON

Syrian Christians Celebrate in Their Own Way.

Abstain from Animal Food for Forty Days—Worship in an Unheated Dark Church.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

MOUNT LEBANON, Syria, Nov. 1.—Murfaa el Mylade, meaning the eve of the Christmas fast, that is, the 14th day of November, is the last day on which Oriental Christians may eat animal food until the 25th of December. The said day, therefore, is observed as a high carnival on which even the very poorest make a desperate effort to secure butcher meat or fowl and make elaborate and sumptuous meals. A good deal of drinking and frivolity is ap parently associated with the Murfaa. On the 15th day of November begins the period of the Christmas fast of forty days, that is, the total abstinence from milk, eggs, butter, fish, and all manner of animal food. People subsist on bread, olive oil, olive berries, pickled turnips, and pulse, (Daniel, i., 16.) Under pulse is included hammuz, a variety of peas, beans, and lentils, which reminds one of the pottage which Jacob cooked, rice, and several other kinds of grain.

The juvenile part of the population seems to prefer dried figs, or figs dried and boiled in grape syrup, also grape syrup pure and simple, which is the grape juice expressed and boiled, varying in consistency, for it is found almost as liquid as water and sometimes as thick as cheese.

On Dec. 24 the butchers resume business, and the activity in the trade is more manifest than on the Murfaa, and the people make their purchases of meat and begin to prepare meals, though they may not taste anything of animal food until the following morning.

Some time between 1 and 3 A. M. of Christmas Day church bells start ringing, and the people begin to wend their way from the various houses through the narrow, dark, and often muddy lanes to the church. We accompanied some of them on more than one occasion in past years to this service. "The sacred edifice" looked at from the outside is of an immense size and of imposing appearance; in height it is a skyscraper, but inside it is void even of the most ordinary comforts. We are 3,000 feet above the Mediterralean, with the snow-clad hills in full view, and in this church the people stand on the stone floor. Most of the windows are without glass, and the wind howls and the rain beats fruiously outside. A few tapers and oil lamps relieve the darkness somewhat. The priest and the choristers or deacons mutter, chant, or scream the service in a manner more dead than alive. How many American Christians would attend service of this kind under such conditions? The service lasts from two to three hours, and then there is a rush for the various homes, where the meal which has been longed for for forty days, and had been many hours preparing, is enjoyed.

During the day friendly festive visits are made and reciprocal presents exchanged, quantities of confectionaries eaten, and gallons of arak (whisky) drunk.

The 5th of January is Barmool-li-Retase, (the eve of Baptism day.) From the earliest hours children scatter themselves over the neighboring country in fields and woods, industriously searching for "bachoor mariam," (incense of Mary,) which is the root of a certain flowering plant like the cyclamen. This root is usually the size of an average potato.

On their return to their respective homes they slice these roots and string them on a linen cord. By this time the mothers have prepared, from ordinary cotton, two or three bunches of wicks, and about dark knead about a pound of flour without yeast or leaven of any kind. This dough is packed in a white napkin, and attached to the strings of cyclamen roots, the wicks and bunches of a species of thyme, and the whole cluster is hung on a tree outside. Then all manner of leaven which can be found about the premises is thrown away.

Shortly after midnight a stranger may be awakened by the deafening noise of boys, emerging from nearly every home and threading their way through every lane, till finally they begin to meet in groups at the fountain, where they shout at the very top of their voices, "St. John baptizeth thee and the Lady Virgin thy godmother." Each of them is carrying a "bachoor" that is no other than the cluster that was hanging from the tree made up with the thyme twigs, cyclamen roots, the wicks, and leaveniess dough.

Suddenly they rush to the trough below the spout, dip this cluster three times, then march away some distance; then return, dip again, still shouting, "St. John baptizeth thee," &c. This goes on till the break of day, and then the bachoor is plastered again on the tree and the performance is repeated on each of the two following mornings. On the third day the mother takes her parcel of dough most reverently, and in dead earnest declares that the unleavened dough had miraculously become pure leaven. Woe to the unbelievers. She then sifts many pounds' weight of flour, mixes it with the newly made pure leaven, and kneads it, and, sure enough, the dough does rise. A piece about the size of an orange is separated from the mass and kept to propagate the leaven during the next twelve months, while the rest of the lump is shaped into cakes of various forms, fried in the sweet olive oil, and served up as meals to the household on that day and during the following three or four days.

A GIGANTIC INCUBATOR.

Remarkable Developments in the Dairy Farming Industry in Australia—

Hatchings Giving 50 Per Cent.

The rapid expansion of the demand for Australian poultry, combined with the possible immense future of the Australian poultry export trade, is leading to some remarkable developments in the dairy farming industry in Australia. Hitherto China has enjoyed the reputation of utilizing the incubator system on the largest scale, but that distinction is now being secured by New South Wales, which has not only the largest duck farm in the Commonwealth, but also probably the largest incubator in the world. The farm and incubator are situated at Botany, near Sydney, the latter, according to a Sydney paper, having a capacity of 11,440 duck eggs, or 14,080 hen eggs.

The incubator, which was designed and constructed by its proprietor, with the aid of an ingenious local mechanic, is on the hot-house principle. In fact, it is a hot-house. It stands in the open and is constructed of ordinary pine weather boards, with a corrugated iron roof.

The egg trays each hold 130 duck or 160 hen eggs, and there are four of these end to end in eleven tiers, one above the other, on either side of the room, or a total of 88. Moisture is supplied in pans beneath the bottom tiers of trays. The heat is supplied by means of steam pipes from a boiler, which is kept constantly going to furnish motive power for the various works in connection with the establishment. Two steam pipes run along under the lowest set of trays each side. The floor is composed solely of a foot of rich black loam.

In some respects the new system has eclipsed the ordinary incubator. For instance, the average of bad eggs, when tested, has been three to four to the tray. The first hatchings gave 43 per cent., and the proprietor considered that those about due would go about 50 per cent. So far this season his incubators have given from 10 to 80 per cent., and since he began hatching in June (the Australian midwinter) he has lost over 8,000 eggs in incubation. At present he has about 5,000 ducklings which he is bringing on for the Australian Christmas market.

One recommendation of the new system is its cheapness. As a matter of fact, it costs virtually nothing, as the excess of steam from an engine boiler furnishes all the heat required. The boiler only consumes 9s. worth of fuel per month. Should the hitherto successful results be maintained, the ordinary incubators now in use will be dispensed with, and another mammoth incubator constructed in their place. A few of these latter would speedily enable New South Wales to export immense quantities of ducks and poultry to the world's markets.

Express Messenger Arrested for Theft.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Dec. 15.—Rosso C. Hoffman, a messenger for the Adams Express Company, was arrested yesterday on the charge of having stolen fourteen diamonds valued at $2,500. The gems were found on his person.

GIFTS FOR THE SEASON.

Every one would suppose that every woman—every man, for that matter—in the city or out of it had everything needful in the way of silver for the toilet table and that there would be no wants to supply this year. But the opposite is the fact. More people are to have gifts of toilet silver this year than ever before. One reason for this is that in times past people have allowed themselves to be carried away by the cheap silver on the market, and it has always proved unsatisfactory. It shows its cheapness on its face, does not keep clean or clean well, and there has been a reaction against it. Finer silver and handsomer pieces are being bought for the toilet table than ever before.

***

Very elaborate sets of toilet articles are being sold entire and may cost any amount, some handsome sets selling for $1,500 and more. These include everything that could be desired for the toilet table—mirrors, brushes, bottles, the smaller articles, and handkerchief and glove boxes—all of silver.

***

The finer toilet articles are hand-wrought, genuine works of art that are a permanent joy to the possessor. Among these the most refined are the engraved pieces, and etched silver is also beautiful. The machine ornamented silver that is turned out by the gross does not please people who like good workmanship. It is more satisfactory to have one good piece of silver than half a dozen cheap pieces.

***

People are turning more and more to pretty fancy boxes, and the silversmith has taken note of this tendency. Handkerchief and glove boxes of solid silver come in beautiful designs. They are large and commodious, velvet or satin lined, and sell for from $100 to $150. These are new and popular.

***

A handsome calendar, new this year, which is set in silver mountings, is a church calendar, with blanks for engagements. The calendars are of fine handmade paper, with broad margins of a churchly red, with the exception of that part where the days of Lent come in, where the edges are of purple. This is to denote to my lady that the engagements she jots down on those days must be of a seemly, sober character. With the purple-edged leaves before her, she cannot pass over one of the serious forty days to be devoted to good works. The calendars are made to stand or hang. The mount can be replenished with new calendars each year. The lessons and psalms for each day are given, with Church seasons and changes of the moon.

***

The martelé or the hand-wrought silver, in fine French gray, is not new in this country, but it is always beautiful. In American workmanship it took the prize away from the Frenchmen at Paris this year. People who are familiar with it know that it is beaten into shape and the design worked out entirely by hand, the workman turning out an entire article, whatever it may be, from a plain sheet of metal. All sorts of things come in this silver, articles for the table in designs of varying elegance, smoking sets, and other articles in common use. There is nothing more beautiful in the line of silver.

***

Smoking sets, which are attractive, are in ivory, stained a warm brown and mounted in silver, with a silver tray.

***

The most massive tobacco jar on record is a genuine elephant foot, made up with an elaborate silver cover. That is a design which cannot easily be duplicated.

***

Pretty new things in the way of candy jars are graceful shapes, tall and slender, the cover tapering up to a point, and the jar proper tapering down to the stem, which is supported by a standard. They are of silver over glass, usually colored. The silver is perforated, or in an open-work design, showing the glass through. These have been popular in Paris, and only a few have been made in this country.

***

Other new and attractive things in the way of silver have followed the fashions in games. Bridge whist sets come in silver cases, and, with the game at the high-water mark of popularity, are going like hot cakes. There are bezique sets, dominos in silver boxes, and pearl poker chips, also in silver boxes.

***

The beauty seeker has learned that the bath is a great revivifier, and one of the popular articles in silver this year is the sponge cup. These come in all sizes, and those most in demand will hold great sponges as big as cabbages. They are pretty things, these sponge cups, and they are lucky mortals who will receive them Christmas.

***

There are many varieties of liqueur sets in silver and glass, which are among the popular gifts for men. Champagne handles, which fit on to the bottle, are attractive and not expensive.

***

"L'art nouveau," as applied to jewelry, is after the style of Lalique, the Frenchman who has made the many curious designs in which celebrated people have expressed their and his original ideas. With the popular use of semi-precious stones in jewelry people are getting an artistic standard in their ornaments that was not possible when only the intrinsic value of the stones was regarded.

***

The baroque pearls can be counted in this class. They are to be found in as many beautiful color tones as the regular pearls, and their irregularity adds to their charm. They are made up in some beautiful pieces of jewelry.

***

Nothing can really equal a genuine pearl, and it has few competitors. Some in the handsome pieces of jewelry this year are so large that they have the appearance of soap bubbles which have accidentally fallen. In pink shades they have the appearance, some of them, of bits of sunset clouds. With all their delicacy some of these large pearls are too conspicuous to be in really good taste in an ornament.

***

This is the time of year when the jewelers with good names are receiving requests for boxes. It is so much more satisfactory to send a gift in a box upon which is the name of a good maker. The boxes are not to be had for love or money unless they are sent with purchases, when they are sometimes used a second time. This is a dangerous practice, however. Just after the holidays comes the time when the shopkeepers are besieged by people who bring boxes which bear their names, but contain goods from cheaper shops. The gift receivers who have had duplicate gifts are trying to exchange them. This is a contingency which the gift sender does not consider, and it is awkward.

***

There are regular places where boxes of all shapes, kinds, and sizes can be obtained at any price ranging from a few cents to as Observations on the Recent Brief Session of Parliament.

A NEW FORM OF OPPOSITION

"Break with the Financial Gang," Cry the Reactionary Liberals.

Indifference of England Toward China and the Canal Bargain—Connaught to Replace Lord Roberts By and By—The Indian Problem.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.
Copyright, 1900.

LONDON, Dec. 15.—Our brief Parliamentary session has ended as anticipated. The Government has obtained its £16,000,000 almost without demur, and, superficially, it would seem, goes on a holiday as strong as before the houses met. Mr. Chamberlain has beaten off his assailants and the official Opposition has once more surrendered to the Imperialist faction, so much so that critics taunt it with being really in Lord Rosebery's hands, in spite of all protests to the contrary.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, indeed, has proved too weak for his post of mere amiable platitudinarian and there is an undercurrent of agitation on foot to have him replaced once more by Sir William V. Harcourt. Sir William alone among the old chiefs of the Liberal Party has stood forward in the fight, and his two speeches were both powerful essays of financial criticism, but none of the leaders of the Opposition except Sir Robert Reid and Messrs. Bryce and Edmund Robertson squarely faced the South African problem and demanded a sweeping change in the policy. Much denunciation was indulged against Sir Alfred Milner, and small men and big clamored for his recall, but the prevalent feeling in the public mind is that the whole show was to a considerable extent futile.

One must not always judge by appearances nor can one accurately gauge the drift of popular sentiment by merely perusing the speeches as reported in the newspapers. Talking with the members over affairs I get quite a different impression from what known events convey. A new form of opposition is said to be gathering in force and to portend much trouble to the Ministry within its own fold when the House meets again. Expression was given to the dominant feeling by young Arthur Markham, a large colliery proprietor and son of a man whom I knew as one of the stanchest Liberals and most upright of men in his time. The watchword is, "Break with the financial gang." No settlement can be possible in South Africa while everything is ordered by Rhodes, Eckstein and Company. It is useless to talk of peace in the conquered states or between the races while all the posts in the annexed territory are filled with dependents, creatures of the De Beers ring.

THE PULSE OF THE HOUSE.

These sentiments are excellent, but how far they are to be productive of practical results I would not venture to estimate. From my point of view the House of Commons is still alarmingly out of touch with the country. Elected on a stale register, with false issues put before constituencies, it flounders without definite aim and dissipates its energies in what may be called guerilla warfare.

Neither the House nor the Ministry can have a long life under such conditions. A resolute Opposition would not have been trapped by Chamberlain's specious talk about "conciliatory measures" of Crown Colony Government, &c. The news trickling through on most days from the seat of war or from Cape Town indicates that passions are ever rising in South Africa, and that sterner measures are contemplated by the new commander in chief, whose career has certainly hitherto avoided any illustration of the quality of mercy. Equally impossible would it have been for Chamberlain to root his foes when confronted in the Commons with a circumstantial story setting forth the extent to which his wife, sons, daughters, brothers, cousins, nephews, and relatives generally were profiting by the enormous military and naval expenditures of the country. Yet the man simply danced upon his enemies and cowed them into silence. As mere rhetoric his performance was brilliant and the tactics displayed by him in his defense might render him a worthy opponent of De Wet could he be dispatched to the front to take command of the columns continually exhausting their transport in trying to hunt that Boer leader down.

THE APATHY OF THE COUNTRY.

One would not mind so much the feebleness of Parliament and the confusion of a cross current continually dissipating its energy were the country showing signs of intelligent appreciation of the principles underlying public morality. It seems to do nothing of the kind. If anything, the masses appear to grow in indifference, and, although a minority of those who think becomes daily more numerous, more outspoken and resolute, it also wastes its strength because unguided. The crowded meeting in London last night hissed Rhodes and cheered Steyn. To what good?

I cannot hope to convey to you the extent of our present indifference to every public question outside this South African one. An apt illustration, however, may be found in our reception of the news from your side about the action of Congress over the Nicaragua Canal bargain. Terribly inflaming messages from New York are printed in our newspapers and the alarm drum is beaten by paragraphists absolutely in vain. Nobody, so far as I can measure, seems to care a straw what you do about this canal, and I would not venture to say that Lord Salisbury will make much of a disturbance should you decide to uphold the Monroe Doctrine in all its vigor and treat the projected waterway as a purely American affair.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is harped upon and we are warned that unless we bestir ourselves and shout, not only will it go, but the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as well, and not one man in a hundred knows or cares to what these compacts really refer.

It is the same in all directions. I am privately assured by a man who has passed through the Chinese troubles that the powers are only at the beginning of their misfortunes in that country, but it is quite useless to put forward this view in a mixed company. Two or three people may assent in a vague sort of way and some extremist will perhaps venture to assert that it is a jolly good thing, too, that there should be a mess, since we are out of it and the French and Germans in. But the majority will turn to other subjects, tacitly or openly admitting that they neither know nor care anything about China. It is drift and drift at all points, and the absorbing care about this South African running sore, which we seemingly can neither cauterize nor heal, submerges all other thoughts. Well may the French publicists say among their friends that they are glad to see England's hands full, since, while they continue so, the rest of the world can do as it likes. There is an involuntary tribute to our influence conveyed in this view, but it is none the less unpleasant for that.

THE ANGLO-PORTUGESE ENTENTE.

Let us try a change of subject. A great deal of fuss has been made this week over the salvolatilized speechifyings in Lisbon. They are thought to portend important concessions to us at Delagoa Bay sure to be valuable when peace is restored. We are alleged to have given Portugal money with which to pay the railway award, which is nonsense—though perhaps De Beers did—and to have obtained in return the rights over that East African port to the exclusion of other nations. I doubt even this, and if, as is hinted, a great company is to be formed to take over the alleged concession Portugal has given England, you may be quite sure Germany will have a finger in it.

The Germans, indeed, have been this week openly proclaiming their strict adhesion to business principles in dealing with this country. "We had nothing whatever to gain by receiving Krüger," Count von Bülow, with the frankness of Bismarck, stated in the Reichstag, but a good deal to get from England by giving the old man the cold shoulder. Von Bülow is quite right. We have not even fight enough left in us to resent his subordinate's announcement that a request equivalent to a command had been conveyed to a firm engaged upon the manufacture of new artillery for us to refrain from fulfilling the order. What floods of ink would have been spilt in denouncing Germany over this attitude had we been able to look about us and take note of the slights and insults to which other powers seem free to subject us.

LORD ROBERTS'S POSITION.

We begin to understand why Lord Roberts is coming home to assume the post of Commander in Chief at the War Office. He is to be the warming pan for the Queen's son, the Duke of Connaught. This had been suspected all along, and is now generally admitted. His little lordship is too old and, apart from mere soldiering, is quite too insignificant a man to be placed in the charge of this important post at a time when great changes in our army organization are in contemplation. The work would be altogether beyond his strength, so Lord Roberts is to have the Duke as adjutant, and presently, after a decent interval, he will step aside loaded with honors and pensions and Connaught will reign in his stead.

I wonder whether the nation will object to this quiet little family arrangement. It used to make noise enough about poor old "Umbrella George," as the Duke of Cambridge was nicknamed owing to some episode in the Crimea, real or imaginary, but we are tamer now, and unless popular sentiment swings around it is possible enough that Connaught may become a dictator of the army and executant of reforms calculated to make it a body more than ever held apart from the control of Parliament and the nation without any serious protest. Court Ganymedes assure us that the Duke is a very respectable man, unaffected by the usual social vices that incrust royalty, and there certainly is a remarkable absence of scandalous society gossip in connection with his name. But he is not a man of any particular ability either as an administrator or a leader of troops.

LONDON MUNICIPAL REFORM.

I have not mentioned our new London Borough Councils since they assumed power over us, but it is cheering to know that they are doing first rate as imitators of our fine old cobwebby city corporation. Their reputation for consuming excellent dinners and for wearing gorgeous robes is already considerable, but the bill has not reached us yet, and our feelings therefore are still of unmixed admiration.

Is it not remarkable, as a further illustration of the essentially parish vestry character that may sometimes permeate even an imperial race, that Parliament should have met and separated without, as far as I know, a single word having been uttered about India? Not even a question was asked regarding the numbers, over 10,000,000, who have perished by famine or the condition which is starving the cultivators still alive. The great peninsula committed to our care might have been another planet for all the thought the House of Commons bestowed upon it.

From that country also, I regret to say, private advices are anything but comfortable. Our worst enemies could not have the heart to triumph over us at the sight of the complicated problem we must face there, almost immediately, if the great imperial fabric of our viceregal splendor is not to be irremediably tarnished.

THE CHRISTMAS SHIP SAILS.

The Cunard liner Lucania, which sailed for Queenstown yesterday, had the honor of again winning the title of the "Christmas ship." That the title was not misapplied, was shown by the extent of her mail cargo. There were 23,252 packages in 2,013 sacks. This was the largest cargo of mail that has ever been transported across the Atlantic by an east-bound vessel.

While England was the destination of the great bulk of the packages, every European country was also well represented in the addresses.

ARCHITECTS IN DISFAVOR.

Three Members of American Institute Receive a Hint to Resign.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—At the last session of the American Institute of Architects the committee to pass upon certain charges of unprofessional conduct preferred against three members of the Institute made its report. After reciting that "the Board of Directors, in view of the findings of fact presented in the cases of Henry Ives Cobb, George Edward Harding, and William Tyson Gooch, have found the parties guilty of unprofessional conduct and of conduct prejudicial to the best interests of the profession, but have permitted them to remain fellows of the Institute in good standing and in full enjoyment of all the privileges of membership," the committee recommends that it be resolved that "the continued membership in the Institute of persons adjudged guilty of unprofessional conduct is repugnant to its members, and is an anomalous condition," and that copies of the resolutions be sent to each member of the Institute.

The alleged unprofessional conduct of Messrs. Cobb, Harding, and Gooch was in connection with the building of the State House at Harrisburg, Penn., to replace the structure destroyed by fire.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—The President to-day sent the following nominations to the Senate: Albert Wheelon, to be Register of the Land Office at Pierre, S. D.

Henry E. Cutting, to be Receiver of Public Moneys at Pierre, S. D.

Second Lieut. James Hanson, Fourteenth Infantry, to be First Lieutenant.

James E. Boyd of North Carolina to be United States District Judge for the Western District of North Carolina, which appointment was made during the recess of Congress.

A HISTORIC "BLACK BOOK"

Curious Volume in the Library of Columbia University.

Record of Misdeeds of King's College Students for Five Years Prior to the Revolution.

Carefully stored away in the vaults of Columbia University Library is a small leather-bound book which in its way is the most curious in the whole collection of nearly half a million volumes. The name which has been given to this interesting piece of literature is "The Black Book," and this is seen to be particularly appropriate, for on the title page is written: "Book of Misdemeanors of King's College, New York." It includes a period of four years prior to the Revolution, dating from January, 1771, to August, 1775. Shortly after this latter date, or in April, 1776, the college buildings were taken for military purposes and work was not resumed until 1784.

The various entries were made by a Visitation Committee, composed of members of the Board of Governors, and show the different attempts made at securing discipline and order among the unruly students and the modes of punishment to which the culprits were subjected. Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and other early notables attended the college about this time. They are not mentioned in "The Black Book," showing that they must have been exceptionally good or, at all events, adepts at escaping detection.

The first record shows that the modern college boy comes honestly by his sign-stealing propensities. It reads as follows:

"Shreve, Abrahams, Bogert, confined in college for taking tea cups out of another student's room, and denying that they knew anything of them. N. B.—Shreve, the most culpable. Liberated." In the next entry a "publick" reprimand is recorded against Shreve, who is charged with the heinous offense of having come through a hole in the college fence at 12 o'clock at night. Under the date June 22, 1771, is the entry: "Shreve suspended by the President for coming over the college fence at ½ past 11 o'clock, last night." Later on, however, he was reinstated in the college, was graduated in 1773, and afterward became a minister.

In 1772 is entered: "April 28, Robinson spit in the Cook's face, kicked him, and otherwise abused him; of which he—the cook—complained to the Governors as they came out of chapel, after hearing the students of the senior class for their degrees." On May 1 a committee meeting was held for the purpose of looking into these charges, but Robinson had absented himself from college without leave. Three days later, however, on May 4, justice was meted out to him as follows: "The committee met again on the same business, when Robinson, for insulting and ill-treating the Cook, & also for neglect in his collegiate exercises, of which the professors complained, was confined by the committee after being publickly reprimanded, & ordered not to go beyond the college Fence for the space of two week; also to perform such exercises as the President should assign him, besides attending his class at recitation, etc., as usual."

On July 8 of the same year is entered the following: "Douglas, for stealing 8 sheets of paper and a penknife, was reprimanded in the college hall before all the students, and after having his gown stripped off by the porter, he was ordered to kneel down and read a paper containing an acknowledgment of his crime, expressing much sorrow for it, and promising amendment for the future. He was forbidden to wear his gown or cap for one week." During this same month, which seems to be especially full of mischievous deeds, there is a record against three students "who had gone over the college fence the preceding Tuesday, between the hours of 3 and 4 P. M., to bathe."

One practice which was frowned upon by the committee was card playing, although it was much practiced among the students. On June 30, 1773, is this entry: "Seaman, Remsen, Kissam, Van Beuren, and Read, for playing cards in the college, presented to the Committee of Visitation July 12, ordered by the committee that Van Beuren and Read, as stayed transgressed more than once, have exercises set them adequate to their offense, and that Seaman, Remsen, and Kissam, being old offenders, be re-presented to the Board of Governors at their next meeting."

The cook does not seem to be the only one to suffer ill-treatment at the hands of the students, as we see by the following entry: "July 13, 1774. Rapalye, primus, suspended by the President, till the next meeting of the Governors for using Mr. Harpur in the most scandalous manner, and making use of the most indecent language." And on July 21: "Rapalye—being duly convicted of the charge before ye Board of Governors—was sentenced to be expelled."

The last entry in the book records a sentence which was most characteristic of the time: "August 4, 1775,, ordered that Bayard and Gavan for being deficient each in 2 exercises, and also for frequently absenting themselves from recitations, be confined within the college walls from next Monday till the Friday following; and also besides their usual academical exercises translate No. 316 of The Spectator into Latin, and get by heart 40 lines from the Beginning of Book 1, Sec. 1, of Horace. In case of Failure or Neglect in any of these Particulars to be immendiately presented to the Board of Governors for Degradation of Expulsion."

Eight months after the last entry was made the college buildings were given over to the American troops, and when the college reopened, in 1784, the record was not continued.

DIVORCE FOR MRS. GILLIG.

Sealed Decree in the Case Against Her Husband, Harry C. Gillig.

Mrs. Amy C. Gillig has been granted an absolute divorce from her husband, Harry C. Gillig, formerly Commodore of the Larchmont Yacht Club. The referee's report is sealed, and the name of the co-respondent is not disclosed.

Mrs. Gillig is the daughter of the late Charles Crocker of San Francisco. She was first married to R. Porter Ashe, the California turfman and lawyer. She obtained a divorce from him about ten years ago. There was one child, which was given into the custody of Mr. Ashe. Mrs. Gillig is an enthusiast for French bulldogs, and has exhibited many of the breed in various dog shows. She is a sister of Mrs. J. Sloat Fassett of Elmira, N. Y.

Mr. Gillig is a member of the New York Yacht and the Manhattan Clubs, and was until recently a member of the Calumet Club.

FIGHT FOR MOTHER'S ESTATE.

Robert S. Putnam Sues His Brother Israel for a One-Third Share.

The fight between Robert S. Putnam and his brothers, John Risley Putnam and Israel Putnam, the sons of the late Supreme Court Justice of Saratoga, for the possession of the estate left to their mother by her father, Robert M. Shoemaker, a Cincinnati millionaire, who died in 1885, was carried on in the Supreme Court yesterday before Justice Russell, when the suit of Robert S. Putnam, to have him declared entitled to a one-third share of her property, was brought to trial.

Mrs. Mary S. Putnam, the mother of the plaintiff and of the defendants, died on Sept. 28 last, and disposed of her property by will to her son Israel, who was a Lieutenant in the United States Army, and whom she visited in the Philippines. Mr. Shoemaker, by his will, provided that his executors were to sell his property, and, having retained control over it for two years, were then to divide it share and share alike between his five children, of whom Mrs. Putnam was one. He, however, made a further provision, by which Judge Putnam was to manage Mrs. Putnam's share, which was to descend to her children in equal shares at her death. Judge Putnam died in October, 1899, and since then there has been no trustee of the estate, which consists of valuable real property in Saratoga, and about $100,000 in the Lincoln Safe Deposit Company.

The question raised was whether the main provision in Mr. Shoemaker's will, directing that the executors divide his estate equally between his five children at the expiration of two years after his death, did not nullify the subsequent provision providing that the share left to Mrs. Putnam was to be created a trust fund, of which she was to have the income for her life, and which was to be equally divided between her children on her death.

SEEN IN THE SHOPS.

Pretty silk-covered coat hangers can be bought for $1.25. Portable hangers can be bought for the same price and they are treasures for the traveler. No one who has not seen the bad effects of hanging coats and jackets from hooks, been bothered by broken loops and stretched collars can appreciate the convenience of these things as they deserve. There are three of them which come in a neat little case, and being adjustable, they are shortened to convenient size for carrying, and take up only the smallest amount of room in a traveling bag.

***

Little traveling needle cases come in the smallest imaginable space in a tiny case the shape and size of a doll's opera-glass case and that of a small doll. In one side of the case is a thimble—a silver thimble can be substituted for the one in the case if desired—and in this is one tiny spool containing black thread, and in the other side is another little spool, made small to fit the space and the occasion, while in a little flannel leaf on the inside of the top of the case are a few needles. This is, of course, only a temporary affair for use to catch up a rent which must receive attention at once. But the little case is so dainty and attractive and small that it is a treasure. It can be carried without inconvenience in the purse. The cases are in bronze, black, and other colors of leather. They cost 50 cents.

***

Small square leather workboxes are made with special spools, and in a small compass carry a large variety of silks and threads and all the implements that a traveler who was not going into the dressmaking business could need for a long visit, trip abroad, or Winter or Summer vacation.

***

***

Pretty little calendars are in the form of little slates with wooden frames, the figures in white on black. There is a separate card for each month. There is a leather back and rest to the little slate. They cost 50 cents and are put up in little pasteboard boxes, and are dainty little gifts.

***

The prettiest thing in name cards for luncheons or dinners are petals of flowers in tinted cardboard, crumpled exactly as the petals of genuine roses would be. One of these at each plate to agree with roses, which form the table decoration, is very pretty and dainty.

***

***

The candle which is sure not to allow an iota of wax to fall upon the carpet is in the form of a little silver lantern with colored glass. The lantern is of the exact design of that which John in the country takes out to the barn to feed the horses at night or to go down into the cellar for apples and cider. It is not half the size, however, and it certainly costs double the money.

***

The last penny in the slot machine is a bank for the children. It is made of gun metal. Put a penny in the slot and a lever which is pressed will register the amount the bank contains. It will register up to $5, and opens with every 50 pennies deposited. There is no registering unless the penny first goes into the slot. The bank costs $1.

***

A rubber company has out a genuine Harlem goat, said to have been designed by a famous Harlem artist. The reproduction is perfect in every respect, and not only of the Harlem, but of the Brooklyn goat, which is to be found in the colonies of Brooklyn's little Italy. The goats are only 50 cents, and there has been a run on them this month by Harlem and Brooklyn parents. The only criticism which can be made to the animals is the voice. It is a little tin whistle squeak, not to be distinguished from that of a cat or a cow or a little rubber baby.

***

Ermine is the fashionable fur for dolls this season.

***

In every crowded shopping district in the city the automobile is to be found endangering the tempers of shoppers. It is the twenty-five-cent automobile of the street vendor, and has now been on the market for some time.

***

Playing cards never came in prettier and cheaper little leather cases than this year. They range in price from less than a dollar a pack in a case to—well, one may pay any price for them. But pretty cases and very good cards can be found at reasonable prices.

***

Fancy playing cards come in such beautiful designs that it is strange that people do not think of them more often for gifts. The fine cards in fancy designs are somewhat expensive, but they make charming gifts to the lover of cards.

***

Wash gloves that come in kid are new and cost only $1.75. They have the appearance of a regular glacé kid. They come not only in white, but in colors and in black, and all will wash equally well. They are put upon the hands and washed in soap and water and allowed to dry on, and they have the appearance of brand-new gloves.

***

Clocks are to be seen on most of the fine stockings now. Some girls who like fancy work are buying stockings for Christmas gifts and working the clocks upon them. These gifts are often made appropriate by having the favorite flower of the recipient, her name flower, or something of that kind in the work.

***

A stylish flannel shirt waists, big rings are found in many of the best designs. These are woven in the flannel, but the girl who is working the clocks on the stockings has bought a plain waist of flannel of a stylish make for her sister. On the front of the waist of this she is working rings in a simple stitch. She makes a series of rings in threes, marking them herself with a small spool, three linked rings, one upon the other, the links set well apart. The waist is of a pale lavender, and the rings are worked in different shades of purple which blend. It is stylish and pretty, and no other waist in the city will be quite like it.

***

Pretty ribbons are picked up in the shops and bought in one and a half and two yard lengths, and the girl who is clever with her needle embroiders the ends for gifts for her friends.

***

Pretty things in tea cozies are in coarse linen in stylish shades. They are heavily embroidered. There is white upon yellow and upon gray and yellow upon different soft shades of blue. A stylish cozy has animal designs, quaint figures of birds in white, the ground work of solid embroidery in a soft pink, the design being emphasized by an outline stitch of black.

BOOZ INQUIRY ON TO-MORROW.

Military Court Will Open Investigation at Late Cadet's Home.

The Military Court of Inquiry into the alleged hazing of Cadet Booz will go Monday to Bristol, Penn., to examine the parents of Booz, and on Tuesday they will go to West Point to examine Col. Mills. The Court of Inquiry consists of Gen. John R. Brooke, Gen. A. E. Bates, and Gen. J. W. Clous. Young Booz died at Bristol recently, and it has been charged that his death was due to treatment he had received at the hands of other cadets while a student at the West Point Military Academy.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Speaker Henderson announced in the House to-day that Mr. Marsh (Rep., Ill.,) had resigned as a member of the Booz investigation committee and Mr. Dick (Rep., Ohio,) was appointed in his stead. Mr. Dick becomes Chairman of the committee. Mr. Dick, however, is disinclined to serve and says he will consult Speaker Henderson before determining his course. In case he accepts the committee will meet early next week and arrange a programme of procedure.

Capt. Thomas R. Adams, Fifth Artillery, has been detailed to duty as Recorder of the Court of Inquiry of which Gen. Brooke is President, to inquire into the alleged hazing of ex-Cadet Booz.

RAID BY SYRIAN ROBBERS

Preparing for a Siege—Influential Greeks in Prison—Foreign Consuls Taking the Matter Up.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

SHWEIR, Mount Lebanon, Syria, Nov. 1.—Burge Saffita is a modern village built on the ruins of an ancient Hittite town, and contains a burge or a tower of great antiquity, from which it takes its name. It lies several hours' ride northeast of Tripoli, in the heart of the district which for the last half century has been the scene of American missionary enterprise.

In this village lives an opulent and influential Greek Orthodox family named Belt Bashure, under whose roof the writer has dwelt since last Spring. Two weeks ago a messenger arrived in Burge Saffita covered with dust, and informed the Belt Bashure that in Tell-el-Aadis, a village between Saffita and Tripoli Mohammedan spearsmen, including several hundred Arab spearsmen, armed to the teeth, had assembled and were threatening the Christians. It was said they might be expected at any moment to swoop upon Burge Saffita and wipe the place out of existence.

The Bashure summoned their dependents—that is, those who plow their fields—and put them under arms. Few had any expectation of a victory over the Tell-el-Aadis invaders, but it was hoped we could stand a siege until relief came.

The Monastery of Mar Elias, within the bounds of the village, was favorable for the defense, so the women and children were huddled together and as many of the live stock as could be accommodated brought in. The remembrance of recent Armenian massacres did not reassure every one, but the Superior of the monastery made up his mind to kill at least twelve before he should himself suffer "martyrdom." Nobody expected to escape death, but everybody was busy devising means to put out of the way as many of the enemy as possible before his own turn came.

The threatened attack, however, never came. It appears that the Mutserrif of Tripoli got wind of the affair and before the raid began proceeded to Tell-el-Aadis and induced his coreligionists to abandon the contemplated attack against the Christians. He argued that they had better leave the matter in the hands of the authorities and that the Sultan's Government would in due time bring the offenders to justice. "Moreover," he said, "your victory over the Christians would certainly be a very costly one." These arguments finally prevailed, and soon afterward it was learned what had caused the anger of the Mohammedans.

It appears that shortly before sunset of the day preceding the uproar a stranger entered the village of Tell-el-Aadis and inquired if the Begawat were at home. The word "Begawat" meant the gentlemen of the house of Aboud, who are the Mohammedan aristocracy of Tell-el-Aadis. The stranger was told that the Begawat were in the guest chamber.

"I am bringing them two loads of tobacco," said the stranger, "and I should like to know if there are any Custom House officers in the neighborhood who might seize the stuff."

The stranger was told there were no officers in the village and that he might bring in the tobacco as soon as he liked. The same evening, about two hours after sunset, fourteen horsemen surrounded the guest chamber. One of the party advanced to the front door, where he found one of the Begawat, on which he fired five times, but only wounded him severely. Then he went on into the chamber, where he saw two more of the Begawat. He shot one of them dead, while the other escaped by a back door. The robbers then captured three of the best horses and got safely away.

The Mohammedans of Tell-el-Aadis immediately accused the Christians of Burge Saffita of being the robbers. Five of the Bashure family are now in prison in Tripoli. The priests and the Bishops of the neighborhood of Saffita are trying to secure the influence of the foreign Consuls so that at least the prisoners may have a fair trial either in Beyroot or in Constantinople. C. N. Lischine, Consul General of Russia in Syria, supported by his French colleague, is said to be very much interested in this affair.

The Mutserrif of Tripoli, who, as stated, restrained the Mohammedan horsemen from attacking Burge Saffita, has been summarily dismissed by the Porte; so also has the local commander in chief in Damascus for some share he had in the business.

This unfortunate affair is the general topic here, and many fear the incident will be followed by serious consequences.

The Porte itself is not free from perplexity in dealing with the affair, for if they should clear the Christians the Mohammedans of the district will be enraged, and especially the more ignorant and less scrupulous among them; if, on the other hand, they should condemn the Bashure family, there will be the Consuls to reckon with.

HEARD IN THE ELEVATOR.

Lawyers Sanguine of Victory Cheer Their Clients on Aerial Flights.

If the average elevator man in the great down-town office building had the time and inclination to jot down in diary form the fragments of conversation dropped by the various tenants on the flying trips between floors during a month, a week, or even a day, the collection would make a weird and fascinating volume. It would contain little flurries in stocks and bonds and collateral securities, schemes for consolidation, hints on the developments of mining properties, hopes of inventors, plans of promoters, a tinge of romance, a little happiness, a hint of sorrow, bits of literature, of art, of science, of history, a glimpse of architecture, of agriculture, of pedagogy, of medicine, and a flood of legal lore.

Whether it is because there are so many more lawyers in the big office buildings or whether they make more trips up and down on the elevators during the day or whether they are more given to dropping remarks of "shop" than their fellow-tenants during their aerial passages has never been satisfactorily figured out, but the fact remains that elevator lore fairly reeks with an atmosphere of legal proceedings. The mind of the average elevator man is saturated with habeas corpuses, certioraris, and mandamuses taken in homeopathic doses, and the very elevators are steeped in "lis pendens" and demurrers.

These scraps and fragments of legal sentences, caught between floors, often pass between counselors, but the vast bulk is conferred in a loudly confidential tone by the lawyer upon the client. To the casual auditor the burden of the sentences is of an exceedingly hopeful and optimistic character. It would seem as if the trouble and sorrow of the world had just been somehow satisfactorily arranged in court, and the average listener begins to wonder how the other parties to these various suits ever had the nerve to take their cases into court at all. Sometimes the clients look bewildered, too, but happy, and there is no doubt or discouragement or sorrow in the mysteriously worded remarks of the lawyer in the elevator. Just as the listener is becoming fascinated by the fearful and wonderful phrases, the speaker and his client reach their floor and alight, after which another attorney begins to comfort his client and so on to the top floor.

"Exemplary damages are ours without a doubt, for having secured the extinguishment of the estate I secured a writ—"

"I made him agree to a joinder of issue, insisting that it was an equitable conversion, as there had been an executory contract per se—"

"I will mandamus him to-morrow and will get an order to show cause—"

"—and if they enter a demurrer we will come back with a bill quia timet—"

"—Oh, that answer was filed long ago. They haven't got a leg to stand on if it comes to a question of—"

"—the writ of certiorari did the busi—"

"—If we cannot file a bill of survivor and supplement, why, of—"

"—not the least trouble to replevin. Oh, certainly we'll give them two weeks to answer the summons. Now, when that party et al.—"

"—it was a lis pendens and it was vacated forthwith. I insisted that it was an equitable conversion—"

"—when it came to an examination of title—"

And so the story runs all day, and will go on as long as the world is troubled and clouded with man's inhumanity to man.

FOR WOMEN'S WINTER GOWNS.

Corduroy is one of the materials which is universally becoming, and its revival is always welcome. This is a corduroy season, and many of the handsomest suits of the Winter are made from it. It comes in all colors and shades, and is made in all sorts and conditions of suits, from the elaborate street gown worn with handsome furs, to the bright-colored golf frock.

But the most popular thing in corduroy is black. It has not been possible to fill the orders for black corduroy this year, and many women are without them simply because they have not been able to obtain the material. They are not only popular now and worn as suits, but they promise to continue in popularity well into the Spring, and they are most satisfactory made into separate skirts. After the black the blues, browns, and tans vie with each other in popularity. There is a medium shade in the blues, a bright dark blue, the Napoleon blue, which is a popular shade whether because of its own merits or the popularity of "L'Aiglon" it will take something more than a dress expert to tell. Matelok, a blue with a purple tone, is another popular shade, and the dark navies are in demand.

In the brown there are some attractive shades—Java, which is dark; beaver, tabac, which is very dark; the Nordore, a golden brown, and there are light shades. The bright colors are also popular, and there is the girl who wears a golf suit of bright golf red, the old hunters' pink, and the shades of red run through crimsons and maroons, with rosa, which is a soft shade really something of a mauve, and old rose which has the same tones, but is darker. All these colors are made up in full suits, and not only in the corduroy, but in velutina, which is also popular, pretty, and durable.

Metallic velvet is a new special product, and makes up stylishly in many ways. It is in black and white—white dots and tiny figures of various kinds on the black ground—printed, but in such a manner that they are permanent. Some of the tiny white dots come in groups, and others are at regular intervals apart. The latter are the most popular, perhaps because a model suit has shown the good effect of that pattern.

A pretty material in this line for fancy waists is in Persian designs, the material twenty-two inches wide, and $1.25 a yard. With the velvet finish these soft patterns are particularly attractive. They are all in light tones—soft blues and grays and lavenders. There is a tendency to use them for evening gowns, which will be seen later in the season.

For the most elegant evening gowns just now there is nothing more beautiful than the velvets and the mirror velvets, the mousseline velvets, as they are called from their softness, are used in all the soft pastel shades. These mirror velvets are used for all purposes, and modistes and milliners are united in singing their praises. They will fold and twist and hang in the most delightful of folds, and they will not crush. The same material is used for suits and hats, and there is no danger of the difference of a shade in matching when both come from the same piece.

For suits the black is popular, but the colors are made up quite as often. There are dark green and dark red, which are popular; a few browns of different shades, castor, and a soft and pastel blue, which has silver tones, is also popular for street frocks.

Panne velvets were never more popular than this year, and are used for trimming, for whole suits, and for separate waists. These latter are in the fancy figured pannes. The panne in raised figures are beautiful and effective, and the velour au sabre has a raised figure with a plush-like effect, the nap pricked up as the name implies.

Another velour has fine raised stripes, and is in black and white, with a cut-out snowflake dot in white or in colors. These are stylish things, made up for both waists and suits. They are quite new this year, and consequently worn by women who like originality, and it will take another year before they will become common enough to be called popular.

For her velvet jacket my lady buys velour du nord, a heavy velvet which comes with a thick nap. It is to be found in fine quality, in black, and is used only for jackets, elegant coats, and wraps. It is the material which combined with sable and chinchilla is something to dream of. There is another velvet of a fancy design which is also used largely for coats. It has an irregular cut-out design, which gives it the effect of baby lamb.

DOG A THIEF CATCHER.

Capt. Titus Welcomed by an Old Friend in Eldridge Street Station—"Yaller's" History.

When Capt. Titus, after two years' absence, was ordered back to the command of the Eldridge Street Police Station, he found at least one old friend to welcome him. This was "Yaller," a very small, meek-looking dog of a nondescript color which the policemen in the station house are kind enough to call yellow. "Yaller" jumped up on Capt. Titus when he entered the station house for the first time after his absence, frisked around him, and behaved himself altogether in a way which made it impossible for any one to mistake his joy.

"He's all right if he isn't very pretty," said the Captain when the little dog had tired himself out with his demonstrations of joy and subsided in a corner. "He's the only dog on the police force so far as I know who has ever caught a prisoner."

"Yaller" gained his reputation as a thief catcher one warm Summer evening about three years ago. At that time he was a self-invited and rather unwelcome guest at the station house. He had been in the habit of prowling about a small grocery store on Eldridge Street, just opposite the station house, and when the store was closed by the owner, who moved back to Italy to spend the rest of his life in retirement, he was left without a home. He invaded the station house for food and shelter, and at first was not received very hospitably. One of the Sergeants, however, treated him kindly and allowed him to come inside the house when he was at the desk, and the little dog soon learned to know when he was in charge. At such times he sat at the open door of the station house gazing pensively at the big tenements across the way. At other times he kept discreetly out of sight, knowing that the only welcome he would receive from the policemen would be an occasional kick.

One night when his friend, the Sergeant, was at the desk, "Yaller" was seated at the door as usual. A man snatched a pocketbook from a woman's hand a little distance up Eldridge Street and started down the street past the station house on a run before the policeman on post could reach him. He came flying past the station house with his pursuer over a block behind and with an excited crowd following. This was the golden opportunity of "Yaller's" life, and he seized it with all the strength of his jaws.

As the man rushed past the station house a streak of brownish yellow shot through the air. The next moment the fugitive let loose a shriek that made the Sergeant behind the desk jump up from his seat and aroused every one in the neighborhood. When he reached the street he saw a mass of something rolling about in the gutter and a policeman pounding it vigorously with his club. A moment later the mass resolved itself into its component parts. One part was a small dog with a very determined expression of countenance and a big piece of cloth grasped firmly between his teeth. The other part was a thoroughly frightened man with a part of his garments missing. He was dragged into the station house, locked up, and a few months later sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

Meanwhile "Yaller," his captor, had become a well-recognized member of society. Since that time he has been allowed perfect liberty to come and go as he pleases in the station house. Every new policeman who comes to the precinct is told of his exploit and treats him, thereafter, with all the respect due to a "plain clothes man."

At 12 and 6 o'clock, when the men are turned out to relieve those on duty, the dog marches out with the others and stands at attention before the Sergeant's desk. He listens to the orders read out by the Captain with proper decorum, and when the men file out attaches himself to a patrolman whose post lies in front of a restaurant. There he is sure to receive a bone or something eatable. After satisfying his appetite he returns to the station house to wait until the next platoon is turned out. Lately he has been growing fat and unwieldy, but he has never been known to fail yet in his duties as a regular member of the police force of the city.

MEXICAN DRAWN WORK

Its Possibilities and the Difficulty of Obtaining It.

Trials of a Woman Who Has to Deal Directly with the Capricious, Pleasure-Loving Workers.

People have not yet learned the possibilities of Mexican drawn work. They do not know either of the increasing difficulties in getting it and in getting it at so-called reasonable prices. For the actual value of the work, double the prices which have been obtained would be reasonable. A little Southern woman up town, who may be called a movable exchange for woman's work, and who makes a specialty of this drawn work in its finest lines, told some interesting things about it the other day.

Much of the work that comes to this part of the country comes through a middleman—who is a woman—who makes a business of getting the work from the Mexican women, lives in Mexico to look after it, and, incidentally, it may be said, has her hands full. The work from the time it first became popular has been marvelously cheap in price. The Mexicans live simply, they do the work with ease, and have been taking what they could get for it. Now all this is changing. The fine workers are beginning to understand the full value of their efforts. They say to the purchaser: "You get good prices for our work that you sell, and we expect more money for it ourselves."

As in other lines of work, the best workers are not numerous, and to keep the market supplied with the finest work it is necessary to pay for it. And with their growing independence the Mexican women are becoming more variable and uncertain to deal with. In some cases they demand, with the materials given them, half of the money they are to receive for the completed work. This is unfair, but the poor middlewoman is obliged to pay the money demanded of her or the work will not be undertaken, and she has the orders of her customers to fill.

Even with the money paid there is no certainty that the work will be done as promised. The middlewoman, after waiting a proper length of time and hearing nothing from the workers, makes a trip out of the city to their homes to see what is the matter. Sometimes she will find that not one stitch has been taken or a single thread drawn. The Mexicans are a pleasure-loving, care-free people, and the money paid for the work has gone for merrymaking, and not only is the work not completed, but the worker may refuse to do it at all. If she does there is nothing to do but count the money paid up to profit and loss and

THE FRANCO-BRAZILIAN BOUNDARY DISPUTE.

A Practical Vindication of the Monroe Doctrine.

Written for THE NEW YORK TIMES by

JOHN BASSETT MOORE,

Professor of International Law, Columbia University.

On the 1st of the present month a telegram from Berne appeared in the press briefly announcing that the Government of Switzerland had on that day rendered an award upon the boundary between Brazil and French Guiana, and that its decision was favorable to Brazil. This simple announcement marked the termination of a long-standing dispute, the importance of which, as affecting the extent of European dominion in America and the actual and potential control of navigable waters, has been little understood outside the countries immediately concerned in it. That it was appreciated by them may be inferred from the ability, the learning, and the careful preparation which they caused to be bestowed upon its elucidation. The French claim, originally covering about 150,000 square miles, embraced in its final form about 100,000, an area more than twice as great as that of the State of New York, while in its southward reach it touched the mouth of the Amazon. In opposing this claim, Brazil may be said to have stood for an American cause and the Monroe Doctrine, and the vindication of her position by the arbitrators' award is an event worthy of attention.

The disputed territory, now adjudged to Brazil, lies in that vast region, north of the Amazon, which the Spaniards called Guiana, (Guayana,) and out of which were carved Portuguese Guiana, French Guiana, Dutch Guiana, and British Guiana. In the late arbitration Brazil stood as the successor of Portugal, to whose title she succeeded on becoming independent. On the north the territory lately in dispute is bounded by the River Oyapoc, or Vincent Pinson, and the Tumuc-Humac Mountains; on the south, by the River Araguary and a line drawn westerly therefrom; on the east, by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the west by the Rio Branco. The determination of the title to the territory thus bounded involved practically two questions, (1) that of the boundary on the seacoast under Article VIII. of the Treaty of Utrecht, and (2) that of the boundaries of the hinterland.

The dispute between France and Portugal as to boundaries in Guiana began in the seventeenth century, after the occupation by the French of the Island of Cayenne in 1676. The Portuguese were established at Para as early as 1616. In 1625 they had several missions and forts on the northern bank of the Amazon, and between 1623 and 1632 they expelled, by order of the King of Spain and Portugal, the English and Dutch settlers, who had erected forts in that region. In 1637 Philip IV., of Spain, III. of Portugal, annexed to Brazil the territory lying between the Amazon and the River Vincent Pinson. In 1646, six years after the independence of Portugal was proclaimed, the Portuguese expelled the Dutch from a post which they had established near the mouth of the River Cassipore, southeast of the mouth of the Vincent Pinson or Oyapoc.

In 1697 a diplomatic discussion was entered upon at Lisbon between the French and Portuguese Courts, originating in the arrest by the Portuguese of Frenchmen who in 1652 began to cross the Oyapoc to trade with the Indians in the region north of the Amazon. The French Governor of Cayenne claimed the Amazon as the southern boundary of the French possessions, and Louis XIV., espousing this pretension, directed him to seize all the Portuguese forts and settlements north of that river. He was able to take only the fort of Cumau or Macapa, which the Portuguese recovered a month later. By a provisional treaty signed at Lisbon March 4, 1700, a part of the contested territory was neutralized. In 1706, however, Portugal became the ally of Great Britain, the Dutch Republic, and the Emperor, against Louis XIV., in the war of the Spanish succession, and the Franco-Portuguese dispute as to boundaries in South America thus found its way into the deliberations of the Congress of Utrecht. In the negotiations that ensued, Portugal had the support of Great Britain. Lord Bolingbroke, who was then Secretary of State, not only advised Louis XIV., through the British Ambassador at Paris, of the Portuguese claim to the Oyapoc, but also intimated that France would be required to renounce any claim of an avenue of approach to the Amazon country as well as any claim of a right to navigate the river in common with the Portuguese. Louis XIV. accepted these conditions, Portugal on her part abandoning all claim to certain forts and territories which the allies had promised her in Spain. As to boundaries in South America, the treaty between France and Portugal, concluded at Utrecht April 11, 1713, contained, (Article VIII.,) on the part of Louis XIV., an express renunciation of all rights and pretensions to territories situated between the River Amazon and the River "Yapoc, (Oyapoc,) or Vincent Pinson."

In 1723 the Governors of Cayenne began to contest the position of the River Oyapoc, claiming at first that it was the Cassiporé, or Cachipour, and afterward that it was the Mayacaré, the Calçoene, or Carsemenne, and, finally, the Carapaporis. They alleged that the word Japoc, Oiapoc, or Oyapoc, was a generic name of the Tupy language for "river" or "canal," and that the only definitive name in the treaty was Vincent Pinson, which designated in the old maps a river near the Amazon; but they did not then lay claim to the hinterland, to which France afterward asserted title. During the French Republic and the empire, new boundaries in Guiana were imposed on Portugal, but the treaties by which this was effected were expressly set aside by the additional articles between France and Portugal, signed at Paris May 30, 1814, and by Article CVII. of the Vienna Congress treaty, June 5, 1815, it was provided that "the River Oyapoc, the mouth of which is situated between the fourth and fifth degrees of north latitude," as claimed by Portugal, should form the boundary, which was to be amicably delimited "conformably to the precise meaning of Article VIII. of the Treaty of Utrecht." To that end a convention was entered into between the two powers Aug. 28, 1817. By this convention the position of the Oyapoc was again precisely stated, in accordance with the Portuguese position, and the boundary was carried along that river to the point where it strikes the parallel of 2 degrees 24 minutes north latitude, while the western limit of the French territory is placed at a point somewhat less than the fifty-sixth degree of longitude west of Greenwich. Commissioners to carry this agreement into effect were appointed by Portugal, but not by France, and the convention remained unexecuted.

In 1822 Brazil became independent. In 1835, a revolution having broken out in Para, the Government of Louis Philippe established a military post at Amapa, and the Governor of French Guiana informed the Governor of Para that France had decided to take possession of the territory between Oyapoc and Araguary, in accordance with the treaty of Amiens of 1802. On the ground that Portugal was not a party to that treaty, and that her title to the territory was confirmed by later, as well as by earlier, agreements, Brazil protested against the occupation. On Dec. 11, 1838, Lord Palmerston instructed Lord Granville, then British Ambassador at Paris, to draw the attention of the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the treaty of Utrecht, of which Great Britain was a guarantor, and to the Vienna treaty of 1815 and the Paris convention of 1817, and to say that, as the territory plainly appeared to belong to Brazil, her Majesty's Government, as then advised, was inclined to think that the French Government would perceive that the local commanders had gone too far, and that the occupation ought not to be continued. The British interposition was seconded by the American Minister at Paris, and the French Government in 1840 ordered the withdrawal of the post at Amapa. In 1841 it was agreed that the territory should be neutralized, pending negotiations; but the diplomatic discussion did not begin till 1855, and it ended in the following year without result. France then claimed as the "Yapoc," or Vincent Pinson, a stream called Carapaporis, above Cape North, and a line parallel to the Amazon as far as the Rio Branco.

In 1894 the discovery of gold in the disputed territory attracted large numbers of foreigners, and in the following year the Governor of French Guiana sent a force to seize the village of Amapa, in the neutralized territory, and to liberate a Brazilian negro, who, having accepted from the Governor an appointment as honorary Captain, was arrested by the commander of the local Brazilian forces. A French gunboat dispatched to the scene of the difficulty met with serious resistance, and a bloody fight took place between the French and the Brazilians. It was this incident that induced the two Governments to endeavor to arbitrate the boundary question without delay.

The treaty of arbitration, the result of long and complicated negotiations which began in Paris in 1895, was signed at Rio de Janeiro, April 10, 1897. As arbitrators, the parties chose the Swiss Federal Government at Berne. In the first article of the treaty, relating to the boundary on the coast, the French now claimed the Araguary or Araway; and the arbitrators were authorized to designate, as the "Yapoc" or Vincent Pinson of the Treaty of Utrecht, either the Oyapoc, the Araguary, or any intervening stream. Brazil adhered to her claim of the Oyapoc.

As to the hinterland, Brazil claimed (Treaty of Arbitration, Article II.) the parallel of 2 degrees 24 minutes north latitude, from the Oyapoc to the Dutch frontier, as laid down in the Paris convention of 1817. France claimed a line parallel to the northern bank of the Amazon, from the source of the principal branch of the Araguary to the confluence of the Rio Branco with the Rio Negro; the thalweg (deepest channel) of the Rio Branco, from its mouth to a point on the parallel of latitude running through the westernmost point of the Acaray Mountains; and a line along that parallel, eastward, to the point last mentioned. The arbitrators were authorized to accept either of those claims, or to adopt, as an intermediate boundary, a line "from the principal source of the river declared to be the Yapoc or Vincent Pinson," to the Dutch frontier, along the crest of the Tumucumaque or Tumac-Humac Mountains.

The parties to the arbitration were required to submit and exchange their cases and evidence within eight months after the ratification of the treaty. Another term of eight months was allowed for the submission and exchange of their replies or counter-cases; and, pending the rendition of the award, which was to be given within a year after the presentation of the replies, the arbitrators were allowed to call for further information and evidence.

The members of the Swiss Federal Government, forming the Tribunal of Arbitration, were Messrs. W. Hauser, President, and E. Brenner, Vice President, of the Confederation; and Councillors E. Müller, A. Deucher, J. Zemp, R. Comtesse, and E. Ruchert. Councillor E. Müller, late President, was charged with the duty of making the report, on which he worked assiduously for a year. An excellent lawyer himself, he had the assistance of some of his country's most learned men, among whom may be mentioned Dr. Von Salis, Professor of Law in the University of Berne; Drs. Stoel and Früh, Professors of Geography in the University of Zurich, and Drs. Burkhardt-Finster and Schweiger, Professors of History at the Universities of Basel and Zurich, respectively. The award, however, represents the collective judgment of the seven members of the tribunal, by whom it is signed.

The case and reply of France, which were presented through the French Embassy in Berne, were prepared in Paris by a commission composed of M. Legrand, late Minister to the Netherlands; Prof. Vidal de Lablache, Mr. Gabriel Marcel of the National Library, and other competent persons. The Marquis de Moncian, late Minister to Venezuela, and Mr. Albert Grodet, once Governor of French Guiana, were associated with Mr. Bihourd, the French Ambassador, as counsel. The French statements and documents occupy three volumes, accompanied by an atlas containing thirty-five maps.

Brazil was represented by a special Minister, the Baron de Rio-Branco, who acted in a similar capacity for his country in the arbitration of the Misiones boundary question with the Argentine Republic, before President Cleveland, in 1894-5. A second time he has made his cause successful and has established, by painstaking and tireless research, accurate and profound learning, and luminous demonstrations, his fame as a great historical geographer, easily holding, among those who have turned their attention upon South America, the first place. His statement and reply, in behalf of Brazil together fill thirteen volumes, including three atlases, with about 200 maps, (covering a period of 400 years,) and an album of photogravures of original manuscripts. The collection of maps is of the greatest interest, containing among other things, copies of important manuscript maps never before reproduced, and is the most luxurious publication of the kind ever made. Several old parchment maps in the British Museum, or in other libraries, public or private, in Europe, are reproduced with the rich illumination and profusion of gold and silver of the originals.

IN FOREIGN LANDS.

THE ADJUSTMENT OF THE CONGO-GERMAN EAST AFRICAN FRONTIER.—The agreement just arrived at in Berlin between a representative of the Belgian Government and the German Government in regard to the disputed frontier line in East Africa has not excited any apprehension in British diplomatic circles, although by it an end is put to all idea of connecting the British spheres in North and South Africa in accordance with the Kimberley treaty of 1894. There was a clause in this treaty which leased to Great Britain a strip of land between Lakes Tanganyika and Albert Edward, but owing to strong protests raised by Germany this clause was canceled and the Belgians, who would have profited by the lease, secured a quid quo pro through another clause. Moreover it was found by exploration parties that the land in question was not within the Congo Free State territory, but in German East Africa.

Negotiations for the settlement began in January, 1900, when M. Beernaert, Minister of the Congo State, visited Berlin. As a result Commissioners were named to delimitate the boundary. It is said that, although the position of the Congo State was strong diplomatically, it was weak morally, for the Germans had enforced pacification among the hostile tribes in territory that had been evacuated by the Congo State people, and with Belgium's recognition of German supremacy over that territory is annulled the lease clause in the original treaty.

Great Britain, it is believed, will make no remonstrance against such an adjustment, for the Government has been informed that the territory affected by the rectification, although only 175 miles in length, is full of active volcanoes and other natural obstructions, which would render the laying of a railroad there a matter of extraordinary expense, if, indeed, it could be done at all.

After the Belgian-German agreement has been properly confirmed and the frontiers of the British spheres, north and south, and of the Congo Free State and German territory, west and east, it is the intention of the British Government to lease from the Congo Free State a strip of land connecting its spheres which will be more suitable for roadway purposes than the strip mentioned in the Kimberley treaty of 1894.

THE NEW MILITARY JUSTICE IN FRANCE.—The new order of things in the administration of French military affairs begun by Gen. de Galliffet, the Minister of War, and continued by his successor, Gen. André, are said to show most remarkable results in the department of military justice. Statistics have just been issued for the year 1899. They show that the number of men brought before courts-martial for that year was 3,852, out of whom 2,192 were condemned. Three of these were condemned to death, but the sentence was not executed. For insubordination 879 men were tried and 618 convicted, while 814 were accused of theft and 672 of them condemned. The number of men tried for striking their superior officers was 641, and 590 were found guilty; while 381 men were tried for desertion, of whom 328 were condemned. The percentage of convictions secured, as compared with the number of the accused, is greater than any year since 1871-2.

MEASURES FOR PENAL REFORM IN ITALY.—The bill for the reform of the Italian penal system, as recently presented to the Chamber by Signor Grantureo, the Minister of Justice, consists of three parts. The first abolishes the institution known as "domicilio coatto," or a colony to which Anarchists and other dangerous persons are sent, where they are allowed considerable personal liberty under the supervision of the police. The second introduces "conditional punishment," an arrangement similar to the French Béranger law, which allows offenders to escape the penalty attached to a first offense on condition that they do not offend a second time. This part of the bill also contains provisions intended to save young delinquents from preliminary imprisonment while their first offense is being inquired into, and obliges the Magistrate when inflicting a conditional condemnation severely to warn offenders.

The third part of the bill deals with habitual criminals, who are divided into three classes according to their character. The least dangerous are placed under police supervision; the more dangerous are relegated to a penal settlement in Italy, where they are obliged to work either in gangs or singly; the most dangerous are transported to Assab, in the Red Sea, where they are obliged to work in gangs for three years before being allowed to work singly. None of the provisions of the bill is applicable to political crimes, but the measure expressly declares that "crimes which cause the death of, or harm to, one or more persons, or which are committed with means such as fire, pillage, or devastation," are not to be considered political offenses.

THE FRENCH NAVAL PROGRAMME CRITICISED.—A writer in Le Journal des Débats, who is said to be a former Minister of Marine, criticises M. Fleury Ravarin's report to the Budget Committee of the Chamber on the French naval estimates. The proposed programme provides for the building of 28 first-class battleships, 24 armored cruisers, 52 destroyers, 263 torpedo boats, and 38 submarines.

This scheme, the writer in the Débats says, would be well enough if France ever intended or could expect to strike at Great Britain's main naval forces. He points out, however, that such tactics in the event of hostilities would be suicidal, owing to Great Britain's superiority in equipment for building battleships and to her immense advantages as regards facilities for coaling. France could only hope, even supposing the increase of her navy were to be effected at a higher ratio than in the case of her rival, to be able to meet the latter on equal terms at sea for years to come, if ever. The writer concludes that the policy of preparing to engage naval forces twice or thrice as powerful as the French and backed, moreover, by immense resources in building yards and coal mines is absurd and deplorable.

France's only hope, the writer believes, lies in straining every nerve to form a fast secondary fleet. Great Britain's vulnerable point, as shown by the Americans in 1812, is her enormous merchant fleet which her navy could never be able efficiently to protect. In the event of war the first blow which France would have to strike would be at British shipping; for this the fastest possible cruisers are needed; whereas, the naval estimates provide for the laying down of a number of battleships exceeding by four that of cruisers.

The writer concludes by saying that the attempt to construct a fleet which could hope successfully to cope with that of Great Britain is as ridiculous as any military scheme for the invasion of the island, and the amassing of a swarm of submarine craft, the efficacy of which has not yet been fully demonstrated, is more ridiculous than either. What France needs is a secondary fleet made up of small, swift cruisers.

THE CONSTITUTION

AN ORGANISM, NOT A MECHANISM.

An oft-quoted statement of the late Mr. Gladstone embodies a rank fallacy:

"As the British Constitution is the most subtle organism which has proceeded from progressive history, so the American Constitution is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

Equally fallacious is the statement of Herbert Spencer that our instrument of National Government was "obtained by a happy accident, not by normal progress."

The Constitution of the United States is as much an organism and the product of normal progress as that of Great Britain. It is a development, a growth, and it will continue to grow and to adapt itself to the needs of an expanding Nation as long as our Government endures. It has a continuing vitality, and is not an indurated fossil. It contains a skeleton, the framework of the Republic, which has been little changed, and is little likely to be changed, but upon that has been molded in the last hundred years a system which is not yet complete, and to whose development there is no fixed limit. The British Constitution is the creation of the British Parliament. The American Constitution is the creation of the Supreme Court, operating upon the work of the Convention of 1787 and the acts of Congress ever since that date. The process is as truly normal, it is quite as conservative, and it is more harmonious in its results, than that which has been going on at Westminster Hall.

And the work of 1787 was not "struck off at a given time," but was the product of a hundred and fifty years of Colonial experience. It was an evolution from the forces and environment that were making a new Nation through the long gestation of germs planted by the most venturesome and enterprising spirits of a daring age. It had its roots in the first trading charters of the infant colonies. Generations of strenuous men had wrought from royal and parliamentary grants local systems of government which strained constantly upon the authority from which they derived their being, and nurtured independent statesmanship. The necessities of their situation, the need of a common defense, and the exigencies of the general welfare led to many efforts at union of action.

When the inevitable break with the mother country came, hastened by a blind policy of oppression and coercion, the Colonies set to making Constitutions for themselves adapted to the requirements of independent States. The brain and purpose of the time were devoted to Constitution-making, putting in from the lessons of a long and hard experience from Massachusetts to Georgia. Years before the convention at Philadelphia they had been working upon plans for associated effort and united action, learning wisdom through mistakes. In the midst of the Revolutionary struggle the Continental Congress was two years in devising and adopting the articles of confederation, and it took three years more of agitation and debate in the separate States to get them fairly accepted. Then they had a fatal lack of cohesion and failed to secure that "perpetual union between the States" which was their avowed purpose.

Forced by the consequences of that failure, and taught by the experiences of the Colonies and States, the assembled wisdom of the new Nation struggling for life sat in Philadelphia from May to September in 1787, giving form to the results of a political evolution which had reached a critical stage. It was not "struck off," but laboriously wrought out, and almost every provision can be traced to its source in pre-existing material. The whole instrument contained little more than 4,000 words, and can be presented in ten moderate pages of clear print. To make it acceptable to the reluctant States the first Congress proposed ten amendments, which were speedily ratified by the Legislatures. But the Constitution of the United States then existed only in embryo. It has had its real development since, and it is destined to a continuous adaptation to its purpose.

It is commonplace to say that the framers of the Constitution builded better than they knew. Conscious of their inability to see into the future, timid about every departure from what had been tried and proved, and unable to agree upon anything but the most essential provisions of a general Government, for the union of States, they put together a skeleton, covered only with sufficient elastic tissue to give it action. Their enforced self-restraint was equivalent to the highest wisdom, and it was fortunate for the Nation. The Constitution as we have it to-day has been made since their time, and few realize to what extent it is the work of that continuous body of learning and wisdom, the Supreme Court.

For a long time the other departments of the Government were jealous of acknowledging the decisions of the Supreme Court as authoritative over them, and the States were equally so in cases where Federal laws and Constitutional principles were involved. It was regarded as a tribunal for the final determination of the rights and claims of citizens within its jurisdiction, and more than once public authorities refused to comply with its decrees, which it had no power to enforce. But in the determination of the rights and claims of citizens it was compelled to pass upon the validity of statutes under the Constitution, and gradually its authority to do so came to be acknowledged, and its decisions to be respected as settling the "supreme law of the land."

It is only in the last forty years that the Supreme Court has appeared in its full panoply as the molder of the Constitution of the Republic. The tendency of its decisions for forty years before was to weld the Union of States into a Nation, and to stifle the doctrine that it was only held together by a compact of independent sovereignties; but it took a civil war and some amendments of the Constitution to give full effect to the process of making the Union indissoluble beyond question. From that time the august tribunal appeared in the full splendor of its powers, and commanded acquiescence in its authoritative utterances from Legislature and Executive, and from the States and the people. Since then it has been engaged in bringing out the full significance and adaptability to all requirements of those few articles and brief sections which we call the American Constitution. It has clothed the barely covered skeleton of 1787 with the fullness of vitality and vigor which enables the Nation to meet every emergency an untrammeled power; and it has extinguished that doctrine of strict construction which would have mummified the creation of "The Fathers", and made National progress possible only by revolution.

But there can be nothing arbitrary or dangerous in the exercise of the ultimate judicial authority. Dominating as it has become, it is still subject to the enlightened opinion and will of the people. It has no way of enforcing its decrees upon executive officers or upon States. Its very composition and most of its jurisdiction are subject to the power of Congress. States successfully defied the Dred Scott decision. President Lincoln disregarded a writ of habeas corpus issued by the Chief Justice. The composition of the court was changed before the war powers of the Government could be fully developed for the suppression of rebellion. The filling of vacancies was forbidden, and certain jurisdiction was withdrawn to prevent interference with reconstruction when Congress and President were at odds with each other. The number of Judges was increased, and special appointments were made to secure an affirmation of the power of Congress to make Government notes a legal tender for the payment of private debts. Decisions in certain cases have been obviously determined by the exigencies of the National life and the force of public opinion, and they could be changed by the same influences. Incidents like these may be regrettable, but they may also be inevitable, and they are among the factors that help to adapt the Constitutional provisions to their essential ends without wrenching the framework of the Government. They admit the force of public opinion to the judicial chambers to aid in molding the Constitution. But in the main the independence of the Court has been unimpaired and has been rendered safe by the learning, wisdom, and unimpeachable integrity and patriotism of the Judges. Our method of developing a National Constitution is quite as safe and sound as that of mere parliamentary action which prevails in England.

Some of the broad results of constitution-making by interpretation and liberal construction are but just now appearing, and others are yet to appear. By the exercise of implied powers and the authority to make and enforce laws "necessary and proper for carrying into effect" all the powers vested in the Government or in any department or officer thereof, rebellion could be suppressed, war could be carried on and the union could be made "perpetual." Out of the power to regulate commerce, the unforseeable forces of railroads, telegraphs, and steamships could be brought into subjection to national authority and made subservient to the general welfare. And the mere power to establish Post Offices and post roads could furnish authority to suppress riots and break up strikes when they interfered with the movement of the mails.

The acquisition of territory beyond the limits of this continent will give new occasion for a judicial adaptation of the Constitution to the purposes of a growing Nation, and there is little doubt as to the course which the necessary interpretation will take. The precedents of the past already point the way. A fundamental question never yet explicitly decided relates to the wide distinction between the Union of States which constitute the Nation and the territory which is "property belonging to the United States." What is, or what are, the United States? Chief Justice Marshall said of this phrase in 1820: "It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary on the principle of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other."

But this was not an adjudication of the court. It was the dictum of a Judge delivering an opinion in a case which did not involve the question of the meaning of United States or of the uniformity of imposts, duties, and excises. The term "United States of America" was first the style of a confederacy, and was adopted in the Articles of Confederation, where it could only apply to the States which united in a compact. It may be loosely applied to the entire domain over which the jurisdiction of the Nation extends, as well as to the Nation itself, but the plain language of the Constitution implies that the Nation in which the sovereignty resides consists of the States, and the States alone. It may own territory and it may exercise jurisdiction beyond its limits, but it is the States united. The term is always used in the Constitution as a plural—the United States "are," and treason consists in levying war against "them" or in adhering to "their" enemies. Only States and their people were to be represented in the Congress which exercised the legislative power of the Nation, and only States were to take part in choosing the President, who was to be intrusted with its executive authority.

There are no "citizens" except of the United States and of the States which constitute the Nation, and it is to them alone that the privileges and immunities of citizenship are guaranteed. The original Constitution, assuming that there was no distinction between citizens of States and citizens of the union of States, contented itself with declaring that those of each State should be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in any other State. Citizenship was first defined in the Fourteenth Amendment: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." Birth or naturalization and residence must be in the States. In prohibiting slavery the Thirteenth Amendment declares that it shall not exist within the United States, "or any place subject to their jurisdiction," making a clear distinction between the Nation, consisting of States, and places under the jurisdiction of that plural entity. Citizens, whose right to vote cannot be denied or abridged "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," as well as those whose privileges and immunities as such cannot be abridged, and who cannot be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, do not include the inhabitants of territory belonging to the United States, unless they have acquired citizenship by birth or naturalization in the States of the Union.

That this would be the judgment of the Supreme Court cannot now admit of doubt. It has already decided that the United States can constitutionally acquire territory by conquest or purchase in the exercise of the right to declare war, raise and support armies, maintain a navy and to make treaties, and as an inherent function of National sovereignty. The Constitution gives Congress the "power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," and the Supreme Court has held that this power is "general and plenary." It scarcely admits of doubt that it will consistently hold hereafter that Congress may provide for the government of possessions outside of the United States, on this continent or elsewhere, in any way that their condition and the condition of their inhabitants may require. It may dispose of such possessions in any way that the interests of the Nation or the will of the people may demand. It follows of necessity that the rule requiring that all imposts, duties, and excises shall be "uniform throughout the United States" has no application to territory. Not only the law relating to Porto Rico, but the elaborate act for the government of Alaska adopted at the last session of Congress, proceeds upon that assumption with entire safety.

In building our harmonious fabric of Constitutional law upon the framework erected by the Convention of 1787 and the additions put upon it by amendment, the Supreme Court has not only developed the implied powers of the Government, but it has followed out the intent of the separate provisions and of the instrument as a whole. It has ever consulted the necessities of the situation as related to the great purposes declared in the preamble.

It has been contended that the restrictions upon the powers of Congress and the guarantees of the rights of the people contained in the first eight of the amendments adopted in 1790 must be observed in dealing with our new territorial possessions. There is not the least likelihood that it would be so held by the Supreme Court, because it was the intent of these to protect the people of the States which were asked to ratify the work of the convention from encroachments of the central power, which had just been created, and of which some of the States had a jealous fear. The article relating to trial by jury says that in criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury "of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." This clearly implies that these guarantees are intended only for the States and their people, and have no application to the territory belonging to the United States or to their inhabitants. At all events, if the Supreme Court shall say so, as it undoubtedly will, that will become the meaning of the Constitution.

There are other unsettled questions of construction to come up. The Court has already so construed and applied the Fourteenth Amendment as to save it from much of the destructive effect that was intended by its framers, which shows that it may avert consequences as well as bring them about. It has held that, apart from discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the qualification and regulation of the right to vote remains in the States, though the election of members of Congress may be regulated by National law. But if an attempt should be made to reduce back to representation a certain States on the ground that this right has been in some way abridged by qualifications of the suffrage not based directly upon race distinction, how would the court deal with the question? It is safe to say that it would make the attempt of no effect.

But is not this process of developing and molding the Constitution by legislative acts and adjudication thereon by the Supreme Court, subject to the influence of public opinion, a perilous one? Is there safety for our institutions in establishing the doctrine that the sovereignty of the Nation, composed of the States which are represented in Congress, and which choose the Chief Executive, may exercise its sway over an empire of territorial possessions, unrestrained except by the convictions and purposes of the people of that Nation? To say that it is not safe is to doubt the capacity of the people for the control of their own Government. It is to deny the destiny of the United States to take that "equal" as well as "separate station" among the powers of the earth to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them. It is to declare that what the crowned republic of Great Britain is achieving for the advance of civilization and the unification of mankind, the uncrowned republic of America is unfit to share in.

Whatever the expansion of our interests and of our influence through the possession of territory in other parts of the world, the power of Government, the sovereignty of the Nation, will still reside in the enlightened and progressive people of the United States, whose Union cannot be added to without their consent. They will determine the "course of empire," so far as it takes its departure from the Western world; and if they are not equal to their destiny as rulers of the Nation in its relations to the rest of the earth, neither will they prove equal to their destiny as a self-governing people in their domestic affairs.

At all events, their opportunity for development and progress is wide open before them, and the Constitution of the Fathers does not bar their way. The document of 1787 is not a fossil or a mummy; neither is it a fetich to be worshipped in its rude simplicity. It indorsed the embryo of a nationality with latent and dormant capacities of which those who deposited it there never dreamed. Through the instrumentalities there blindly provided, it has developed with the growth and advancement of the people to the glorious proportions which we now behold; and it is destined to a further development, which will enable it to fulfill a grander mission in the earth than the most ardent prophet can yet foresee.

WEBER PIANOS

Letter of Maurice Grau to the Manufacturers, dated June 4, 1900:

Gentlemen:

It is my wish, and that of the Opera Company, that the Weber Piano shall be used at the Opera House next season as heretofore. The magnificent Concert Grands which you have sent us for the Sunday night concerts have more than confirmed the impression that in tone quality, power, and carrying capacity the Weber has no superior in the world. The leading artists of the Company have privately expressed to me their delight in the instruments (both Grands and Uprights) furnished for their private use, and it is the unanimous verdict that for concert-work, as well as for accompanying the voice in singing, the Weber piano is unequalled.

Very truly yours,
MAURICE GRAU.

ANNIVERSARY OF A HOSPITAL.

Celebration of the Foundation of the Presbyterian Institution.

The thirty-second anniversary of the foundation of the Presbyterian Hospital was celebrated yesterday afternoon in the dispensary hall of the hospital. A number of the patrons were present.

John S. Kennedy, the President of the Board of Directors, occupied the chair. Four members of the choir of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church sang an anthem, after which Dr. George T. Purves read the Scripture lesson and delivered an address, in which he spoke of the life of Christ and said that the work which had been done by the Master when on earth was paralleled by that done by the hospitals. He closed with an appeal to the patrons to continue their support of the hospital. Nurses were detailed at the close of the meeting to escort the visitors through the building.

MRS. HEPPENHEIMER'S ARREST.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The story regarding Mrs. Margaret M. Heppenheimer in this morning's TIMES is in some respects incorrect, and I respectfully ask that you give the same prominence to this correction that you did to the original article. The facts are briefly that a woman came to my office, introduced by a gentleman of good standing, who asked that in consequence of her destitute circumstances and merely as a matter of charity I advance $1,000 on a check which she had purporting to be signed by House & Grossman dated one week in advance. This I refused to do without first ascertaining from the company on which it purported to be drawn that the check was good. I found that it was not. She did not get anything whatever from me, and I had the makers of the check notified that their forged check was in circulation.

I never contemplated advancing a single dollar except upon a thorough investigation and the finding that everything was correct, and accordingly was not and could not have been deceived by the representations made. While the paper which she bore gave every evidence of genuineness to the transaction to such an extent that other gentlemen were sufficiently misled as to put themselves to considerable inconvenience and some expense on her account, instead of being misled by her dream of wealth, as implied by your article, I am certainly entitled to the credit of exposing the fraud, notifying the law firm interested, and thereby preventing any one from making losses on account of the transaction.

HOMELESS BOYS AMBITIOUS.

Criticism of President Guggenheimer Answered by Superintendent Heig.

City Council President Randolph Guggenheimer talked to the members of the League for Political Education yesterday about the 3,000 homeless boys in New York City. It is in the proper education of these boys, he said, that the social and political evils of the future can be healed. Mr. Guggenheimer took exception to the lodging houses of the Children's Aid Society, which, he said, though good in themselves, made it possible for a boy to live on 15 cents a day, and, being practically supported, the boy lost the power of looking out for himself and had not a proper ambition. He illustrated this by saying that two boys had lived at these lodging houses for nineteen years. For the benefit of self-supporting girls, he thought legislative action should be taken fixing a minimum rate of wages for their protection.

When Mr. Guggenheimer's remarks were repeated last evening to Superintendent Rudolph Heig of the Brace Memorial, in Duane Street, Mr. Heig immediately protested that they were without foundation.

"No boy has been here for nineteen years," said he, "nor for anywhere near that time, and I believe I may safely say the same of all the houses of the Children's Aid Society. The average stay of a boy here is not over a year at the outside. By that time they have generally attained to sufficient prosperity to enable them to take a furnished room, living entirely on their own resources and with the ambition, which Mr. Guggenheimer fears that our work tends to kill, sharpened to rise in the world.

"Mr. Guggenheimer's statement that a boy's living here on 15 cents a day, which he calls being practically supported by us, tends to lessen the boy's ambition, is not in the slightest degree borne out by the experiences and records of the house. Some of the boys, as a matter of fact, frequently find it difficult to make 15 cents a day. If a boy comes here without money, do we turn him away? No; we set him to work at something about the house—sewing wood, sweeping, &c., to make him earn his living and also to ascertain what he is good for. We have trusted boys for as much as $10, and rarely has a boy failed to pay the money back. Besides paying for their keep, many of them lay up money, and when the sum reaches $40 or $50, put it in the bank. There is no lack of ambition, and I do not believe there is a place in the world where homeless waifs with their own way to make, are more ambitious to rise than are the boys here.

"Judging from the great number of boys who have been sheltered here at one time or another, and who are now making good livings, it is plain that such criticism as Mr. Guggenheimer is reported to have uttered is unjust."

WHO IS SHOCKED?

In beginning his address at Ann Arbor ex-President HARRISON took pains to disclaim any intention to make a legal argument. The address supports the disclaimer by strong intrinsic evidence.

If Gen. HARRISON had been making an argument before the Supreme Court in support of the proposition that the Constitution follows the flag, and that therefore the people of the Philippines and Porto Rico are citizens, he would not have wasted the time of that eminently unsentimental bench by such an appeal as this:

> If the Constitution relates only to the States and their people then all things prohibited in the States may be done in the acquired territory, and this view of the Constitution is shocking. And if it could be done in Porto Rico, why could it not be done in Oklahoma, Indian Territory, and Alaska?

Who is shocked by that view of the Constitution? It is good law to say that when we speak of the States of the Union we mean also the Territories. They are a part of the National domain, not exterior possessions. Yet the Federal Government may not exercise within a State the right of eminent domain, that is, the taking of private property for public purposes, a right which it exercises within a Territory, with or without the action of the Territorial Government. The laws passed by Territorial Legislatures are subject to the approval or disapproval of Congress. The Legislature of a Territory is, in fact, a body to which Congress has delegated powers that are to be exercised under its supervision. The people of a Territory may in convention assembled adopt a Constitution satisfactory to themselves, yet Congress may refuse to recognize it.

The Constitution does not give Congress power to treat States in that way. Yet has anybody ever really been shocked because things prohibited in the States may be done in the Territories? Except for the purpose of opposing the Administration, have sensible and sober-minded persons ever really been shocked by the proposition that the President or Congress may do in the Philippines what the Constitution forbids them to do in the States?

It would, indeed, be shocking if the President or Congress should attempt to govern the Philippines in a despotic and oppressive manner, without any regard for the Bill of Rights—say as Spain governed them prior to the cession. The American people know very well that no President, no Congress, will attempt that. So they refuse to be shocked. Between what a monster and a fool might do and what any President trusted by the people will do is so great a gulf that persons standing securely on the hither side of the proposition are quite beyond the effective radius of the shock. Of course, every anti-imperialist in the country instantly jumps up to say that the Government of MCKINLEY is worse than the Government of Spain, because we are killing off the Filipinos. So the Government would use the military arm to kill off men who should rise in rebellion against its lawful authority in New York or Michigan, where the guarantees of the Constitution have full force and effect.

The American people, being sensible, have recently expressed their belief that the President can be trusted. They know that as soon as the rebellious spirit that actuates a small fraction of the Filipinos has exhausted itself the work of civil administration in the islands will proceed in the temper of the President's instructions to the commission. They know, in other words, that the blessings of free institutions will be conferred upon the Filipinos under American rule just as fast as and just as far as they become capable of understanding and enjoying them, and that under Spanish rule they never would have enjoyed anything of the kind. An unprejudiced mind is not shocked by that situation, and would not be even if ex-President HARRISON was right about the law.

DANIEL WEBSTER, who was something of a hand at expounding the Constitution, declared that "the Constitution cannot be extended over anything except over the old States and the new States that shall come hereafter, when they do come in." Until that time Congress was the source of their Government. The slaveholders at one time eagerly seized upon Gen. HARRISON'S doctrine, the doctrine that the Constitution of its own force extends to the Territories. They wanted, as BENTON put it, to carry the Constitution, "the slavery part of it, into the Territories, overruling and overriding all the anti-slavery laws which it found there, and placing the institution there under its own wing and maintaining it beyond the power of eradication either by Congress or the people of the Territory."

Courts are sensible as well as the people. They are never shocked by anything. They may even approve and give their lasting supreme sanction to conditions that have prostrated the anti-imperialists.

OSWALD OTTENDORFER.

The influence of OSWALD OTTENDORFER in the public affairs of this country has been large and salutary. It was an appreciable gain for us to have a German of his strong character and right-minded views come here to become a citizen and do his life work. His death deprives journalism of one of its sound leaders, and the city and country of a man who from conscience and habit sought to array himself upon the better side of public questions.

Mr. OTTENDORFER was firm, but enlightened, confident of his own opinions, but altogether tolerant of the opinions of others. His newspaper sometimes took and held positions that seemed to be distinctively German-American, as opposed to American, but it supported them with a fervor and hearty conviction that proved that its conductor felt them to be the best Americanism—better even than that of the Americans themselves. He was qualified by his abilities, by his long experience, by his love of country, and by his philosophy for criticism upon the things done and attempted by the people among whom he lived, and one of whom he was. Criticism from Mr. OTTENDORFER had the quality of self-criticism. He aimed to mend, not to wound.

Even in his age and retirement he has been a conspicuous figure in the life and movement of the city. On questions of public interest Mr. OTTENDORFER'S views were sought and valued. He was to the last a working force for the moral and political betterment of the city. Good causes could command his support. He had in abundance that regenerating quality, completely lacking in the make-up of some of the greatest and best-known men in New York, called public spirit. He was informed, felt an interest, and wanted to do something whenever reforms were on foot.

And in the conduct of his newspaper as well as in his personal relation to public affairs, Mr. OTTENDORFER was guided by high principles. It was sound journalism, self-respecting, courteous, just to the reader and to itself. It was an honorable, active, and useful life that has come to its end.

THE PROGRESS OF THE MERIT SYSTEM.

Twenty years have brought many changes for the better in the civil service of the United States, and the National Reform League, which has just held its twentieth annual meeting in this city, may fairly congratulate itself on the progress of the cause for which it has worked.

It is difficult even for those who were at the time familiar with them to realize how many and gross and vulgar were the abuses that were tolerated twenty years ago, and accepted either as proper or as inevitable, which now are abolished or practiced clandestinely. Take one conspicuous instance. All the offices were then filled from one party, nominally as the reward of party service, but often as the reward of service to intriguers in the party, and often also as the result of the most shameful and corrupt personal favoritism. Of course this is not wholly reformed, and some of the ground that was gained has been lost in the first term of Mr. MCKINLEY'S Administration, but the conditions are very much better than formerly. Practically all the subordinate positions in the departments at Washington and the great body of those in the larger offices throughout the country are now filled without regard to party by appointees selected by impartial tests. In the departments, for instance, there are now numerous men and women appointed, on their merits solely, from the Southern States, under the Republican Administration in which Mr. ROOSEVELT was at the head of the Civil Service Commission. Twenty years since that would have been as impossible as anything in politics could be. It works perfectly well, and both the service and the politics of the country are the better for it.

Although the change in the National service is most prominent, that which has taken place in this State is even more remarkable in some respects. To-day the merit system is intrenched in the Constitution of the State and is imposed by a law even more exact and consistent than that of the United States. The benefit has been incalculable. One of the natural and most salutary results has been the development of the system itself along the lines of practical administration. At the dinner of the league on Friday evening Gov. ROOSEVELT, to whom the cause owes a heavy debt, referred to the necessity of practical common sense in the work, without seeming quite to realize to what extent it prevails in the service over which he presides. He mentioned, for example, certain tests of actual work which he regarded as better than those of a written competitive examination. Tests of precisely that character are constantly applied in the selection of employés in the city service, where they are at all possible. And the system has even gone a step beyond what the Governor advocates in the fact that "general intelligence" is now tested solely by questions relating to the duties of the position sought. This evolution of the merit system is one of the signs of its permanence. It has become an essential and ineradicable element in the management of the affairs of a great public business. If it were not so, we may be sure that we should not find so thorough, intelligent, and efficient application of it under a commission appointed by Mayor VAN WYCK.

There still lingers in the mind of the public a vague suspicion that the doctrine of the merit system is a counsel of perfection. Even the Governor who has done so much for it seems to think that it needs a little restraint lest it seek too much. But he is in the thick of many fights, and perhaps does not see the facts as clearly as less intensely interested observers. Our own judgment is that the merit system has made the remarkable progress it has made because it is not a matter of theory but of practical business. It is the simplest, most effective, and most economical mode of administering public offices, and it is the hard common sense, the direct and practical instinct of the American people for doing things that need to be done, that has carried it so far and will carry it further. That it tends not only to efficiency but to cleanliness and honesty in the service and to more rational and decent politics does not, we suppose, work against it in the minds of the American people.

THE FRENCH AMNESTY BILL.

There is a two-fold interest attached to the action of the French Chamber last Thursday in adopting the first paragraph of the Amnesty bill and an amendment excluding cases of espionage and treason from grace. It places the cause célèbre forever beyond the realm of political discussion, and it leaves the verdict of the High Court of Justice in regard to those treasonably inclined persons DEROULEDE, GUERIN, and MARCEL-HABERT untouched.

The individual rights of DREYFUS remain intact. In fact, it is a question whether any amnesty law could modify them. He may, according to due process of law, proceed to secure his complete rehabilitation, although such action can be followed by no criminal prosecutions, no matter what the future revelations in his case may be. Of course, this is not complete justice, as the Socialist Deputy from Dieppe forcibly pointed out in the debate, nor is it complete justice to prevent men like Lieut. Col. GEORGES PICQUART and MM. ZOLA, REINACH, and GOHIER from seeking to obtain adequate punishment for the men who committed crimes against them. But for the sake of national tranquillity the line had to be drawn somewhere, and as M. WALDECK-ROUSSEAU said in his address to the Senate last June:

> The situation was simple. A verdict had been given. It had been accepted. On this side all was over. But other criminal actions remained pending, ready to reawaken the whole drama, while powerless to change its dénouement. Should we allow them to continue, with that outburst of passions of which even here we still find attenuated echoes? We do not think so.

The men who have suffered for the cause of truth and justice have been asked to make a personal sacrifice for the sake of France which they should consider it an honor to assume, leaving history, to which they have given a sure basis of judgment, to deal with the criminals of the General Staff. Ironically a similar request has been made to the champions of MM. DEROULEDE, GUERIN, and MARCEL-HABERT. They, however, are not likely to acquiesce. It does not matter. But the Dreyfus case itself has at length been shorn of all appendages. It is now a matter solely between the condemned and pardoned man and the Supreme Court of Appeal.

BUSINESS, CERTAINLY.

The Montreal Daily Star, in commenting on our recent article on the future of trade with Canada, says: "If there ever should be any improveed trade relations between the two countries, it will be for business and not sentimental reasons."

To that statement we cordially subscribe. It is true that it is easier to do business with a people whose sentiments are like our own, and whom we respect and like; but the end of all business is profit, and no "sentimental reason" that interferes with that ought to be entertained or is at all likely to be.

The error that the United States has made in the past, and one from which our Canadian friends are not altogether free, is in thinking that in trade one party must necessarily lose what the other party gains. This is so far from being true that the only solid foundation for permanent trade is the profit of both parties. To secure this, freedom is needed. If practical freedom existed for commerce between the two countries, we have not the slightest doubt that business would steadily and rapidly increase, and that both we and our neighbors would reap benefit from it.

CHRISTIANITY AND CONFUCIANISM.

It is amusing, if not exactly enlightening, to watch the course of discussion upon the address of our honored guest, WU-TING-FANG, upon the differences and the resemblances between Christianity and Confucianism. To many readers the address seemed a sincere and intelligent endeavor to apprehend the meaning of Christianity upon the part of one who had not been reared in it, and who of course rejected its supernatural sanctions. By such an observer, Christianity may and indeed must be treated as a system of morality, and compared with other systems which either do, or, like Confucianism, do not, claim any supernatural sanctions. No intelligent Christian can take offense at the essay of a foreigner and a "heathen" to compare the Christian religion with his own in its tendency to promote human happiness.

This is what Mr. WU has done, and in doing has aroused the wrath of those who really ought to know better than to be moved to anger. Out of "comity," doubtless, he did not make the most of his case, and politely refrained from adducing modern instances to prove his propositions. If he had not been thus restrained, he could have made much of what is now going on in his own country. For it is not disputed that at least a hundred Chinamen have been killed by professors of Christianity for every foreigner who has been even injured or intimidated by the disciples of CONFUCIUS. But the Chinese Minister confined himself to what appeared to be the tendencies of the two religions, or rather of the two moralities. When he said that Christianity was impracticable, he said no more than has been said by many men brought up in it, who have not professed to be its opponents. FITZ JAMES STEPHEN, for example, in his "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," has given a list of Christian precepts the literal execution of which he declares to be not merely impracticable but undesirable. And when Mr. WU asserts that Christianity is less useful, so to speak, than Confucianism, he is evidently paying a high tribute to it.

At least we should think so if his remarks on this head had not brought upon him so much animadversion from the religious press. What he meant to say was that the imitation of CHRIST was more difficult than the imitation of CONFUCIUS, that the Christian virtues, as BURKE said of the "severe and restrictive virtues," were held "at a market almost too high for humanity," and that men would not aim at a mark they despaired of reaching. But this also has been said by writers who passed for Christian and devout. In a memorable passage of "In Memoriam," TENNYSON sings:

> What keeps a spirit wholly true
> To that ideal which it bears?
> What record? Not the sinless years
> That breathed beneath the Syrian blue.

This is the poetical expression of what Mr. WU has been saying in prose, and been berated for saying. He need not be too much downcast, nor take his critics for authorized exponents of theoretical Christianity, any more than the leaders of the "punitive expeditions" in his native land for authorized exponents of applied Christianity.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

Every American must have some interest in what is officially known as the "Executive Mansion" of the President of the United States, but has been unofficially known, for much more than half of the century of its duration, as the "White House." The building is a dignified dwelling of its class and time, and is worth respecting and preserving on account of its architectural merit as well as of its historical associations. It is commonly supposed to have been copied from a country seat in Ireland. The resemblance is not very close, but it is perceptible. HOBAN, the original designer of the White House, was an Irishman, and doubtless he had in his mind some reminiscences of the architecture of his native island, though it is extremely unlikely that he had accurate drawings of any Irish building, which he reproduced.

At any rate, he produced a building, whether or not he reproduced it, of which we are all proud and have reason to be proud. It has been occupied by every President of the United States excepting only the first and greatest, though he presided over the laying of its cornerstone. It is, in fact, in a completed, or at least habitable state, just a hundred years old this year. Such being its titles to regard, the American people may well be disquieted to have it intimated, on the high authority of the American Institute of Architects, which has just had its annual convention in Washington, that there is a proposition, upon the part of "a ring of army engineers," to vandalize the venerable mansion. We think we can reassure our countrymen on this point, and can even assure them that the opposition of the institute to the project in question proceeds rather from a feeling of trades-unionism on the part of that body than from any more artistic sentiment. Certainly the plans prepared under the direction of Col. BINGHAM do not in the least lack reverence for the existing White House, which has, without question, been practically outgrown. Not only is HOBAN'S building kept absolutely intact, but the additions made to it are upon lines which are distinctly indicated in the actual building, in which the necessity for future extension is clearly recognized. Moreover, the detail of the existing building is, with one important exception, literally copied in the extension. There is also a minor exception in the fluting of the columns in the wings, which are left smooth in the existing building, but this is just what was done by WALTER in the Capitol extension, and what nobody thinks of blaming him for doing. The wings are withdrawn so as to leave the old building the most conspicuous as well as the central feature. We might wish that they had been diminished in height as well as recessed in plane. But the lowering would evidently be incompatible with the retention of "the order," the columns of the portico. And in retaining the order we think there can be no reasonable question that the designer has been well advised.

The one incongruity to which we have alluded is the crowning of the terminal round pavilions with cupolas, which do undoubtedly detract from the proper predominance of the central portico as the most conspicuous feature of the building. The explanation of these incongruous features is that it would have been impossible without them to secure the desired accommodations in the upper story of the wings. The explanation is not, in our judgment, a justification. We think the architectural requirement should in this case be allowed precedence of the practical, and that the roofing of the wings should nowhere be allowed to be visible above the balustrade. With this change, it seems to us, Col. BINGHAM'S project promises a highly satisfactory result. Most certainly it does not deserve the implied reproach of vandalism passed upon it by the American Institute, for nothing could be more deeply reverential of the existing White House than this project for its extension. We can account for that reproach, as we have suggested, only by assuming that the attention of the institute was not directed to the question what it was that it was proposed to be done, but was engrossed by the question who it was that was proposing to do it.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

—That very far from preponderating fraction of all Englishmen which has recently acquired the habit of bathing as frequently and as thoroughly as the primitive facilities that still content it will permit continues to be so vastly astonished at its own emergence from grimy barbarism that for some time to come we must expect to hear, every now and then, talk of the kind in which Lieut. WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL indulged at the dinner of the Pennsylvania Society. Without the slightest apparent suspicion as to the good taste of his remarks, the amiable Lieutenant ran on at great length about the superior cleanliness of Englishmen and Americans as compared with all the rest of the world, and pictured them as advancing hand in hand from land to land, introducing the bath tub wherever they go and so elevating reluctant nations to unwonted heights of civilization. In a concluding burst of eloquence he declared that "the educated Englishman, like the educated American, has a fondness for plunging his body into water which is not characteristic of any other white race, and though we are, in truth, divided by an ocean of salt water, we are united by an ocean of soap and water." Fortunately all this was very funny, for it was also rather outrageous and just a little disgusting. The fact that Lieut. CHURCHILL was pleased—or forced—to credit Americans with the ablutional merits he rashly claimed for his own people shows the weakness of his contention in regard to other folks. We being a wildly heterogenous lot, anything that characterizes us is evidently the mark, not of a race, but of an evolutionary status. Whatever his birth or color, the man who has progressed a certain distance on the road toward complete enlightenment realizes and secures the advantages and pleasures of personal cleanliness, and the differences of the several varieties of humanity in this direction are inappreciable. The sooner that Englishmen cease talking about their baths, the sooner will it be easy to believe that they like them. There are probably twenty real bath tubs in America for every one on equal areas in England, and yet that fact is utterly ignored as a topic of polite conversation in this country. Why can't the Britishers be similarly reserved with respect to the intimate secrets of the toilet?

—According to The Electrical Review, "passengers entering or leaving New York by the Grand Central Station are congratulating themselves and the managements of the railroads centring there upon the great improvements that have recently been made in that structure. The improvements are real, and it is probably true that the passengers are congratulating themselves on the ground that they are lucky to get any consideration at all from these particular corporations, but we haven't heard them congratulating the managements for having made belated and inadequate additions to the facilities of the station. But The Electrical Review can be severe as well as overkind, for it follows up its compliments with some remarks about the policy that permits the use of coal-burning motors in the Park Avenue tunnel. "Some of these days," it says, "somehow, somebody will convince the managements of the loss they are now incurring by operating steam locomotives in these tunnels, and they will believe the truth. Lately they appear to have resembled the Board of Managers of the London Underground Railway, who solemnly determined, a year or two ago, after having spent years in consideration of the matter, to experiment with electric traction and see if it would work! It is stated that they are still experimenting, while the enterprising people who went ahead and built the 'twopenny tube,' or Central London Underground Railway, and equipped it with American electric traction apparatus, are getting all the business. There is a good and worthy moral in this story." What is that good moral? That the possibilities of stupidity are as great in New York as in London? But everybody knew that long ago.

—Hurrah for the torpedo boat Bailey! It is announced with a modest brevity, which shows her officers to be as remarkable as herself, that on Wednesday last the Bailey, while on a casual trip from New York to Newport, made the run between Sands Point to Bartlett's Reef in fifty-six minutes. For fear that the unnautical reader may not appreciate what an amazing achievement this was, it is worth while to tell him that Sands Point—on the north shore of Long Island, just opposite New Rochelle—is in longitude 73 degrees 43 minutes west, and Bartlett's Reef Lightship, at the entrance to New London Harbor, is in longitude 72 degrees 7 minutes west. The latitude of both is practically 41 degrees north. The difference of longitude, 96 minutes, amounts in that latitude to 72.5 nautical miles. Now, if the Bailey went 72.5 nautical miles in fifty-six minutes, and did it without straining either her boilers or the conscience of her navigator, she is certainly a most estimable craft, well calculated to fill with angry and hopeless jealousy all the naval architects of Europe.

—Having given expression in this column to the feeling of irritation naturally inspired by the groundless panic of the Harlem Savings Bank's ignorant depositors, it is only fair to admit that another view of their conduct can fairly be taken—a view that shows them acting entirely within their rights. So long as the bank does not insist on demanding the notice of withdrawal for which its by-laws provide and which is fully explained in all its pass-books, it is under the compulsion of established and recognized custom among such institutions to pay all deposits on demand. That, of course, is exactly what the Harlem Bank is doing, and objection could easily be made to the criticism to which the depositors have been subjected. Neither in the bank or out of it is there anybody with a real right to ask the frightened people why they are taking out their money, or to scold them for the mistake they are undoubtedly making. What they are doing is their own business, and, so long as the bank officials do not think it advisable to postpone payments and thereby give, or rather force, an opportunity for reflection, the depositors are only exercising an unquestionable privilege when they throw away their interest for six months and risk the loss of their capital by carrying it about in their pockets or hiding it under mattresses. It is their interest and their capital, and however foolish they may be, they are hurting nobody except themselves. Judgment as to the adequacy of motives is risky business at best, and the reality of fear has nothing to do with the substantiality of its cause. These poor Harlem people are afraid, they are willing, apparently, to make considerable sacrifices to get their money back into their own possession, and, in the existing circumstances, they are acting well within their rights. That is the other view of the case, and whoever takes it will refuse to second the suggestion that they should be punished by deprivation of the privilege of returning their deposits when their panic is over.

NO NEED OF SMALLPOX SCARE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Permit me to call your attention to and to protest against the thoughtless and frequently malicious practice of circulating exaggerated rumors as to the prevalence of smallpox in the city, particularly concerning hotels. Such people do not realize that by their conduct they prevent strangers from visiting the city, cause the postponement or abandonment of social functions, and, in many ways, hurt the best interests of their city.
